PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE SIXTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, June 27, 1917.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we begin the labors of this day with the mention of Thy name, sending our prayers to Thee for guidance and for direction. Give us the atmosphere of devotion to Thy cause in the labors of this day. May we feel the ever-increasing weight of responsibility, a responsibility so great that all personal interest must fade away into insignificance. Grant that we may feel that we may perform the duties of the day only as we draw strength and inspiration and wisdom and guidance from Thee. So do Thou use us against the blind forces of the world for the promotion of Thy kingdom among men. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. THOMAS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

FINDINGS OF THE COURT OF CLAIMS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a certified copy of the findings of fact filed by the court in the cause of Clotilda Freund v. The United States, which cause was referred to the Court of Claims by the Committee on Claims of the United States Senate under the act of March 2, 1883, known as the Bowman Act (S. Doc. No. 51), which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate communications from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting certified copies of the findings of fact and conclusions filed by the Court of Claims in the following causes:

The cause of J. C. Washington, administrator of Robert H. Love, deceased, v. The United States (S. Doc. No. 53); and

The cause of William Flannery v. The United States (S. Doc. No. 52).

The foregoing findings were, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a list of causes dismissed by the court, which were referred to the Court of Claims by a resolution of the United States Senate under the act of March 3, 1887, known as the Tucker Act (S. Doc. No. 54), which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by G. F. Turner, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 4285) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a telegram, which will be incorporated in the RECORD.

The telegram is as follows:

COLUMBUS, OHIO, June 25, 1917.

The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C.:

The committee on temperance of the Presybterian Synod of Ohio, officially representing a constituency of half a million people, ask your honorable body to adopt complete prohibition as a war measure and that this resolution be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

JOHN ORR,
THOMAS TURNBULL,
C. B. PHILLIPS,
ROBERT HUMPHREYS,
D. F. WILLIAMS,
J. S. LAWTHER,
ISIAH REVENNAUGH,
CLARENCE G. MILLER,
D. A. KEARNS,
PRESTON U. S. BAETZ,
Secretary.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented petitions of the Central Federated Union of Greater New York; of the Farmers' Feed Co., of New York; and of J. D. Simons, of Columbus, Ohio; praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BECKHAM. I present a telegram from Col. E. H. Taylor, jr., of Frankfort, Ky., relative to the prohibition section of the food bill. I ask that the telegram be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHICAGO, ILL., June 26, 1917.

Senator J. C. W. BECKHAM,
Washington, D. C.:

There appears in the Examiner this morning the following: "The food bill can not be advanced until the extreme prohibitionists are brought over to tolerance. Back of the food bill the revenue bill is blocked." I have accepted the sacrifice of my interest. I pray the Senate of this great country will not be bluffed by a pro-German interest to accept its dictation. That the majority of this interest is pro-German I am sincerely convinced. Its success perpetuates the American saloon, the chiefest instrument of beer distribution; and the saloon, open by authority or without authority, will be the instrument of distributing all kinds of drinks. Germany would construe, and construe correctly, the dominance of the beer interest over the Senate as dominance of pro-German sentiment and of Germans in this country. I beg your consideration of these crude suggestions. The German interests have massed their columns to carry the Senate by assault. They will leave no stone unturned.

E. H. TAYLOR, JR.,
Frankfort, Ky.

Mr. FLETCHER presented a petition of sundry citizens of Lake Como, Fla., praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. TILLMAN presented petitions of J. H. West, of Newberry; of the Woman's Missionary Society of Williamston; of the Rehoboth Missionary Society, of Greenwood County; of the Woman's Missionary Society of Verdery; and of Otis Brabham, of Allendale, all in the State of South Carolina, praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. TILLMAN. I present several letters, received from citizens of my State, relative to national prohibition, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the communications were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Swansea, S. C., June 21, 1917.

Hon. B. R. TILLMAN,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: With thousands of your friends and constituents in South Carolina, I am deeply interested in national prohibition, and I am writing to beg and urge you to do all in your power to bring about this end.

I believe you can and will do a world of good in the fight that is going to be made to secure this measure, and I trust your health will allow you to do so.

Yours, very truly,
S. E. SMITH.

BETHEL METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH SOUTH,
Chester, S. C., June 20, 1917.

Hon. B. R. TILLMAN,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR TILLMAN: It would give me great personal satisfaction for you to give the weight of your influence to the bill in the Senate looking to national prohibition of the liquor traffic during the period of the war. I think also that you would thus truly represent the preponderance of the sentiment in South Carolina.

I regret to learn of your recent indisposition, and sincerely hope you are much improved.

Yours, very truly,
C. C. HERBERT.

CARTERSVILLE GRADED SCHOOL,
Hickory Grove, S. C., June 25, 1917.

Hon. B. R. TILLMAN,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Feeling that you are desirous at all times to have the expression of your voters on any subject before Congress, I am writing you this letter to ask you to do all you can to pass the pending prohibition bill. I have talked a great deal about this subject among the voters in this community, and the consensus of opinion is for total prohibition.

It seems to me that now is the opportune moment to pass this very important measure, and I trust that the Senate will pass it.

I have noticed with regret that you had to undergo an operation at the hospital, but I am glad that you did so well in the operation. I trust that you have completely regained your normal health in every respect, and that you will be able to serve us many more years in the future. I am,

Very sincerely, yours, F. T. MCGILL.

Mr. GALLINGER presented a petition of Mount Belknap Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, of Gilford, N. H., praying for the establishment of minimum and maximum prices for food, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. JONES of Washington presented a petition of sundry citizens of Outlook, Wash., praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of the State of Washington, praying for the raising of war revenue by increased income taxes, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. NELSON presented telegrams in the nature of memorials from sundry citizens of Minnesota, remonstrating against national prohibition as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Correll, Mankato, Red Wing, and Minneapolis, all in the State of Minnesota, and of the board of temperance, prohibition, and public morals of the Methodist Episcopal Church, praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. KNOX presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for the abrogation of all patents held by enemies of the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Pennsylvania, remonstrating against national prohibition as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Pennsylvania, praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MCLEAN presented memorials of sundry citizens of Bridgeport, Hartford, New Haven, Stamford, Waterbury, Ansonia, Danbury, Meriden, Middletown, South Manchester, and Wallingford; of the Local Retail Beer and Wine Dealers of Bridgeport; of the Wine Dealers' Association of Bristol; of the Brewery Workers' Union of Hartford; of the Central Labor Union of Meriden; of the New Haven Trades Council; of the Industrial Workers' Association and Retail Wine Dealers' Association of Bridgeport; of the Chapman Electrical Works; of the Manville Machine Co.; of M. F. Cassin; of E. & W. Morgan Cigar Manufacturing Co.; of M. J. Donnelly; of James Martin; of Joseph Coogan; of the Simonsville Manufacturing Co.; of the Thomas H. Hewitt Grocery Co., of Waterbury; of the Mechanics Bank of New Haven; of the Beer and Wine Dealers' Association of Rockville; of the American Gun Barrel Manufacturing Co., of Bridgeport; of S. Loewith & Co., of Bridgeport; of Cigar Makers' Local Union of New Haven; of the Wine Dealers' Association of New London; of the Retail Beer and Wine Dealers' Association of Norwich; of the Wine Dealers' Association of Putnam; and of the Connecticut Hotel Association, of Waterbury, all in the State of Connecticut, remonstrating against national prohibition as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Manchester; of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of South Manchester; of the Watkins Brothers' Manufacturing Co., of Manchester; of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Higganum; of the Connecticut Congress of Mothers; and of the New England Water Works Association, all in the State of Connecticut, praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Greenwich and New Britain, in the State of Connecticut, praying for the passage of the so-called daylight-saving bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Central Labor Union of Greenwich, Conn., praying for the Federal control of food products, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. POINDEXTER presented a memorial adopted by the Washington State Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, remonstrating against an increase in the postal rates, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of the Washington State Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, remonstrating against the importation of oriental labor during the war and allowing them to engage in agricultural labor, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of the Wesley Methodist Episcopal Church, of Berkeley, Cal., praying for national prohibition in the interest of food conservation, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GRONNA presented petitions of sundry citizens of McKenzie County, Oakes, and Verona, all in the State of North Dakota, praying for the repeal of the conscription law, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask unanimous consent to have certain telegrams with reference to the food bill printed in the RECORD and also a letter from Mr. H. L. Bolley, of the Agricultural College of North Dakota, with reference to a plant-disease survey of seed and soil.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MICHIGAN, N. DAK., June 23, 1917.

Hon. A. J. GRONNA,

SEED AND SOIL SURVEY.

Hon. ASLE J. GRONNA,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I learn through daily press reports that there will probably be a national crop survey. Is it to be a crop survey which will tend to increase production and which will eventually prove of lasting worth or is it to be concerned with how to get a large acreage planted and harvested in same old ways? Will it result in worthy advice and direction to the farmers and to the grain handlers or shall we find, as was the case this year, governmental forces, State and Nation, upsetting all previous best advice by advocating the use of just any seed upon just any available land which the farmer might have had plowed? Shall we compel the great Department of Agriculture of the United States of America to do for the next crop, as it did for this, namely, send men over the country begging the farmers to buy any and all of the available seed that might be in any elevator, regardless of its weed content or its disease content, or even without time to consider its viability, etc., and then, through the press and otherwise, beg them to sow every acre. Pardon me, I grant that under the circumstances there was perhaps no other thing to do, but the question is, Are they to continue it next year?

I am led to ask these questions because I note that the Senate the other day struck out of the bill that portion which had to do with a proper plant-disease survey of the seed and soil upon which might be based proper direction for the harvesting of the crop of this year and proper direction for the control of disease for the crop of 1918 and 1919. In this great country I should consider a survey which left out of consideration the actual facts known to science underlying the possibilities of making the available lands more productive for the 1918 and 1919 crops a pure waste of money at this time.

I am inclosing to you a copy of a short abstract of a paper which I am this week presenting on this particular phase of the crop survey before the Interstate Cereal Conference now convening, 12th, 13th, and 14th, at Kansas City.

I hope you will think over this matter seriously and recognize the fact that while the subject of disease control in cereal crops and other food-producing crops is somewhat in its infancy, there is very definite information available for the proper basing of seed selection and crop rotation upon sanitary bases. Properly authorized and a proper survey made, the advice of the Department of Agriculture could immediately become effective upon the crops of 1918 and 1919, and particularly so with regard to cereals. It is in these very crops that principles of crop-sanitation methods have never received proper recognition either from the farming public or the seed and grain handling public. The methods of this latter group, in a very large way, govern the character of the seed which goes into the land each year.

A delay in starting this work before the crop is thrashed, and a failure to continue it so as to provide for proper seed to be used, and for a proper mapping of the lands upon which such seed should be sown, will largely nullify the possible good results of any agricultural survey so far as crop production is concerned in 1918 and 1919.

If seed for the crop of 1918 is to be selected without consideration of the freedom of the fields upon which that seed is grown from the various root-blighting, seed-blighting diseases which the old-cropped lands are infested with, and if next year's crop is to be again seeded without consideration of the previous crops which have been on the land without reference to any sanitary consideration—that is, without a proper survey under systematic supervision as to the factors controlling crop productivity—I for one would not want to advocate the spending of public money for the making of a seed selection or a soil survey at all. It would be far better not to waste the money, for we might as well leave the farmer to his own resources first as last. Better far not to upset his best individual judgment than to revert to the kind of agricultural advice which is based upon no systematic foundation as to facts of seed and soil condition.

Yours, respectfully, H. L. BOLLEY.

[Abstract.]

THE NEXT STEP IN IMPROVEMENT IN WHEAT CROPPING—HOW TO INCREASE WHEAT PRODUCTION IN 1918 AND 1919.

[By H. L. Bolley.]

Attention is called to the conditions which tend to the production of inferior grades and yields of wheat and allied cereals under the so-called extensive or partially constant cropping system. It deals primarily with the influence of internally borne seed diseases and the conditions under which they bring about death of seedlings, lack of stooling, root rotting, and stem and seed blighting in the cereal crops. The paper calls special attention to the problem of soil infection and to the improbability of materially improving the general results in wheat cropping by continuing the present processes, even though they represent, each in themselves, the best possible method, as, for example, the best method of soil fertilization, crop rotation, etc., if the farming and grain handling public can not be made to understand what is really meant by soil and seed sanitation.

The problem of the present conditions of wheat cropping in the great cereal-producing States is set out by means of a number of quotations from a series of publications based upon experimental work conducted at the North Dakota experiment station and on known conditions of wheat cropping in the chief wheat districts as affected by lack of sanitary methods. A joint national soil and seed survey is recommended, to be so conducted that the lands found to be suitable for wheat production in 1918 and 1919 may be immediately put under plow and prepared for that crop. The seed survey should locate those fields which by actual inspection, while the crop is growing, show sufficient freedom from disease effects to warrant that the crop be saved and properly stored for seed purposes; finally, that this seed be commandeered or contracted for and arrangements made for its distribution and use on those lands which are presumably uninfected by diseases and which by the survey maps and records are shown to be suitable for the production of wheat in 1918 and 1919 because of known previous crops.

The paper summarizes the matter in the following words:

"How shall we improve the bushelage and quality of wheat produced in 1918 and 1919? (1) Put on a field-crop survey which will locate seed of highest weight and color quality, reasonably free from disease infection and weather effects; (2) locate the soils upon which such seed shall be seeded; (3) take the proper steps to procure that seed and see that it is sowed. Should the Government find it necessary to force a proper consideration of the lands upon which wheat is to be sowed and the use of the proper quality of seed properly disinfected, it would, in the belief of the writer, eventually receive the entire sanction of the American farming and business public, and we would learn within two or three years of the enormous value which would accrue from proper soil and seed sanitation in the cropping of cereals."

INVESTIGATION OF DEFECTIVE ORDNANCE.

Mr. SWANSON. Pursuant to Senate resolution 71, adopted by the Senate on May 28, 1917, I submit a report (No. 69) from the Committee on Naval Affairs relative to the casualties aboard the steamship Mongolia and the premature explosions of shells on vessels, which I ask may be received and printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report will lie on the table and be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS.

Mr. SWANSON, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 2482) to reinstate Armor S. Heffley as a second lieutenant in the United States Marine Corps (Rept. No. 71); and

A bill (S. 2495) to amend section 1585 of the Revised Statutes of the United States (Rept. No. 70).

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. FLETCHER:

A bill (S. 2515) for the relief of Theodore Mays;

A bill (S. 2516) for the relief of C. B. Oliphant; and

A bill (S. 2517) for the relief of Jessie White; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. SMITH of Maryland:

A bill (S. 2518) to provide for civic mobilization in the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. THOMPSON:

A bill (S. 2519) granting an increase of pension to William J. Seals (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. HALE:

A bill (S. 2520) granting an increase of pension to Alexander D. Smalley; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CHAMBERLAIN:

A bill (S. 2521) for the relief of the Ralph Ackley Land Co. (Inc.) and others; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. KNOX:

A bill (S. 2522) granting an increase of pension to Charles Rote (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. PHELAN:

A bill (S. 2523) to prevent the use of the mails for the purpose of securing false witnesses, suborning perjury, and procuring false testimony in civil or criminal cases; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 4285. An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

"WAR PROFITS TO PAY FOR THE WAR."

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have here an article from the Review of Reviews on "War profits to pay for the war." It is an advance or sheet print of the issue of July 8. It is a very well considered and thoughtful article bearing directly upon the revenue bill which is now under consideration by the Committee on Finance. For the information of the Senate and the public, I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Reprint from July, 1917, Review of Reviews.]

"WAR PROFITS TO PAY FOR THE WAR.

"America's first great war task is to raise money, partly by bond issues, partly by taxes.

"The first loan closed successfully on June 15.

"The making of a war-revenue bill, prescribing the new taxes, was begun by Mr. KITCHIN's subcommittee of the Ways and Means Committee of the House in April last; the bill was passed on May 23. Since then the Senate Finance Committee has been engaged in practically redrafting it along less unscientific lines, with omissions or radical changes of many items, some merely vaxatious, others heavily burdensome, and still others dangerous to industry and more or less futile for revenue purposes.

"Business men affected by destructive proposals in the House Bill hurried to Washington, pleading their willingness to contribute to the Nation's need but begging Congress not to interfere with the processes of their industries in ways that would curtail productive operations and hamper their efforts to be of service.

"The committees of the House engaged on the revenue bill refused to give hearings, and the Democratic floor leader announced that he would vote for it 'with his eyes shut.'

"But many individual Members of the House and Senate were interviewed, and the Senate Finance Committee itself gave repeated courteous audiences to the representatives of interests justly or unjustly alarmed and aggrieved.

"But, even where the objections were well supported, such interviews usually ended with this inquiry: 'But where are we to get the money? We have to raise so much; we counted on so much of it from you people. If it doesn't come from you, whom is it to come from?'

"Thus business men have been forced to consider where this war revenue should come from. And after very little consideration the answer was plain—so obvious that for some time those who saw it could scarcely believe it to be the true answer; could scarcely believe that even with 'eyes shut' Mr. KITCHIN and his associates failed to see it.

"In its laborious framing of schedules to raise a billion and a half dollars (in the House, a billion eight hundred million) toward paying the year's war expenses, Congress has been debating whether a few million dollars can be raised here and a few million more raised there by special taxes on the processes of business. These are found on even surface investigation, in many cases, to bear unevenly and inequitably on different concerns and different industries and to endanger the all-necessary productivity and industrial activity of the Nation by strangling certain branches of business.

"But until weeks after the House bill had actually been passed no adequate attention was given to the one great natural reservoir of distinctively war revenue—the business profits, almost unbelievable in size, for which the war is responsible.

"Congress has been talking about mere millions, the taking of which will in many cases produce hardship, injustice, and depression, when there are scores of millions literally crying to be taken, which ought in every moral sense to be taken, which are ready to be given, and which the Nation will sooner or later have to take—if not quietly and decently now, later on with force and fury.

"To make the case even clearer, we have the object lesson of Great Britain seeing from the first the essential rightness of this method of raising the most important fraction of her war revenue. We see the process working well with her, the money being furnished with the least confusion, evasion, and discontent.

"Finally, the really big men at the head of 'big business' in America, the very men who would be called on most heavily for such war profits, are strongly for it. Their sense of duty and propriety calls for it and their intelligent selfishness demands it. For it is coming, and far better that it should come before a time that may arrive when hundreds of thousands of American boys have been killed, when the pinch of war is felt here, when people are perhaps hungry and unfed, and a few are in possession of billions of dollars of profits which would not have been but for the war, and which have not been properly levied on for the war.

"Mr. Otto Kahn, of Kuhn, Loeb & Co., one of those far-sighted leaders of 'big business' who are asking that the Government should come to them and take the money which ought to pay for the war, assumes that for the year 1917 there will be war-stimulated profits in excess of the average profits of the three years preceding our entry into the conflict amounting to $2,000,000,000.

"He advocates a 40 per cent tax on this excess. The resulting $800,000,000 can be taken without one hundredth part of the hardship that would be caused by a typical device for raising one-fortieth of that sum in the bill passed by the House of Representatives.

"Heads of the other very largest groups of business and financial interests admit the righteousness, expediency, and effectiveness of such a tax and advocate it. A representative of very large interests suggests a rate of 40 per cent the first year, 60 per cent the second, and 80 per cent the third year, if the war should last so long.

"Here, then, are the people in control of the great bulk of these war profits earnestly arguing for the tax. Here is the money that Congress needs to take; here is every moral and business reason arrayed on the side of making the excess war-profits tax the base unit in the whole revenue scheme.

"It is true that there was a clause in the House bill providing for a sort of excess profits tax, on impost of 16 per cent on all profits over 8 per cent earned during 1917.

"Aside from the loose wording and vagueness of the measure it was inequitable in more than one way. In the first place it put a premium on inflated stock issues—the larger the stock issue the larger the exemption. Conversely, it penalized business with conservative or nominal stock issues. In the second place, instead of bringing the impact of the tax on war profits, it put a burden upon businesses that had actually suffered by the war where these earnings, though reduced, were nevertheless large in proportion to capitalization.

"This would have brought severe hardship to tens of thousands of people who had invested in securities of old, established, highly prosperous concerns at prices conforming to traditional high earnings.

"Finally, and most important, the defective principle embodied in the House bill did not get the needed money. Only a little more than $200,000,000 was expected from it.

"Nor would it have been practicable to raise a much larger sum by increasing the rate. It can be seen at a glance that by applying the true principle, by segregating war profits proper, a rate of taxation can be applied which would be in its manifold hardships entirely out of the question in any such defective plan based on the mere arbitrary exemption of a certain percentage of profit.

"In the excess war-profits plan there would be a minimum of hardship—it is probably safe to say there would be no hardship at all.

"For, see the vastness of the earnings peculiar to the period of war. On the opposite page are the officially reported earnings of only 104 industrial companies, those that make public records of their profits, for the five years from 1912 to 1916, inclusive.

"Bear in mind that there are only 104, though, generally speaking, the most important, out of thousands of concerns with profits enhanced, directly or indirectly, by the accident of war.

"The best authorities agree that the earnings of 1917 will, provided unwise taxation does not hamper and constrict industry, exceed the figures of 1916.

"It is plain that even a 40 per cent tax levied on the excess that the earnings of 1917 show, say, over the average of 1914, 1915, and 1916, or a smaller rate on the excess over the average of the five years, would still leave most of these concerns with profits that would never have been dreamed of but for war-stimulated activity. The tax takes only a part of their war surplus and abundance.

"A great war, more particularly the greatest of wars, inevitably separates industries into two groups, one stricken, the other enriched and often vastly enriched by the cataclysm.

"Which should stand the cost of the war?

"It is obvious that only the second group can go far in defraying the cost. It is equally true, though not so obvious, that a serious danger to the success of the war lurks in any considerable addition to the burdens of the industries that have already suffered. In 1913 eminent economists could and did prove that a world war could not be fought for two years with the gigantic demands of modern war financing. They showed that the stored-up capital of the world was not sufficient to stand the strain, and they were right.

"But a greater conflict than they premised has gone on for nearly three years and may go on much longer. This is possible simply because the current productivity of the human race has been increased by greater efficiency and effort, largely by the efficiency of more highly socialized industry.

[1] Deficiency.

"Great Britain and France and Germany and America are producing more iron and steel, more copper and zinc, more ships, and shoes and oxygen and chlorine gas and alcohol than were called for in the charts of productive progress.

"So much the more fatal is it for Americans to shut their eyes in laying taxes, and retard, here and there, instead of accelerating, productive powers.

"This is the real danger, also, in pushing too high the surtax on large incomes. American industry is, in certain fields, the manufacture of motor cars for instance, very much extended indeed, with enormous operations being carried through with scarcely adequate capital. Imagine a mid-western motor car maker who has built up a huge business in five years. He has an annual income of $2,000,000 but is using nearly all of it, and bank loans to the limit as well, to finance a business that has been in existence too short a time for the accumulation of working capital sufficient for the large turnover. With every board of his financial argosy already creaking from the strain, imagine a sudden exaction of nearly half of his year's income. His personal credit at the banks can not stand the squall; necessarily his business feels the force of the blow and with it the various industries supplying him with raw materials and special parts.

"It is a transition period in industry and finance we are facing, and it is of the highest importance that the curves of change should not be too abrupt. The income-tax changes of the House revenue bill are far more abrupt than any seen in the history of this war's financing in Great Britain, France, or Germany. Canada has no income tax at all.

"That this objection to a sudden tax increase from 13 per cent on the largest incomes to as high as 50 per cent is not by any means merely theoretical, is strikingly shown by the shiver and halt in industry that came immediately on the passage of the House bill. It was only after the daily reports of the Senate committee's resolute work in bringing reason and sanity into the bill that trade resumed its buoyant progress.

"By going to the one righteous and expedient, tried and successful, source of war revenue, the excess business profits of war years, the task of making up a given sum of war revenue is so simplified and lightened that not only may the small, vexatious and sometimes destructive special taxes be largely avoided, but even the second great necessary item, a robust increase in personal income rates, may be fixed with discernment and small harm to business.

"It is not by any means only or chiefly the possessors of great incomes that are advocating less drastic rates for the personal tax. Academic economists like Prof. Seligman are making a strong case for a range of surtaxes something like twice as large as the present schedule, instead of about four times as great—the increase prescribed in Mr. KITCHIN's bill.

"An objection has been offered to a heavy tax on excess profits that the Government already demands special prices, much lower than the market prices, from the copper companies, steel factories, and other concerns which would be called on to pay very high excess profits taxes.

"But very little consideration will show that if such special inside prices operate in the war period to reduce the profits of the companies, the next result will be to reduce very much more the excess of these companies' war profits over their average prewar earnings, and thereby to reduce their taxes under this plan.

"But why create friction and vexation by demanding special arbitrary inside prices for the United States or for other governments—prices very much lower than our citizens have to pay, and which are already tending to make private purchasers uneasy and resentful?

"In the first place, such 'inside' prices are useless, because the excess profits tax should take any necessary part of the earnings resulting from the high market prices created by the laws of supply and demand. In the second place, if the giving and acceptance of these arbitrary lower prices for the Government's needs operate to obstruct the one big, essential and sufficient process of boldly taking the money made out of the war as the first and largest part of the tax money to pay for the war—the Government has made a very poor bargain, gaining millions only to relinquish scores of millions.

"It has also been pointed out that certain companies making large profits in previous years might still make large profits without being taxed; while other concerns that had been struggling along in the prewar years have just happened to come into prosperity now and would have to pay a heavy tax.

"It may be answered that if none of the current swollen profits of war have come to the concerns of the first class it is not unjust that the Nation should ask from their earnings no more than the present corporation income tax, together with the added receipts from the personal income tax which their large earnings would increase. As to concerns only now beginning to show profits, it is not easy to find any example of a business that has been operating unsuccessfully in prewar years and has come into sudden prosperity in the present years without also finding the direct or indirect cause of the newly increased earnings in the feverish business activity induced by war conditions. Great Britain has special provision for such instances.

"At this writing the Senate Finance Committee has discarded the House plan and substituted the correct principle for an excess profits tax—an enormous gain if the new plan is finally accepted, for the present war-revenue bill is looked on as a basic structure, presumably to endure as a structure through the war and through any succeeding changes in rates.

"Americans should demand that Congress retain this correct plan, and that it should go far enough, within the limits of reason and safety, in taking the unearned increment of war for war expenses, to leave business at large active and free as possible from tax interferences with its necessary operations.

"The formula for deciding on the exempted earnings may follow closely the British model, with special exemption of 8 or 10 per cent on newly invested money—or a new formula may be prescribed using an average of all or any of the five past years; or the rates may be graduated according to the degree of war prosperity. It is not for the layman to decide on such details, nor are they of the largest importance except in making the tax levy equitable as between different individual concerns. For there are two variable factors, (1) the exempted normal profit and (2) the rate imposed; to raise a given sum of eight hundred to one thousand million dollars either the first may be lowered or the second may be increased.

"But the successful conduct of the war, the rights of citizens and the safety of the country demand that in so far as the unprecedented military expenditures before us are to be defrayed from taxation, the basic and largest item of each levy must be a tax on the new business profits created by the war."

MANUFACTURE OF DISTILLED LIQUORS.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I have an article prepared by the Scientific Temperance Federation, of Boston, Mass., which bears directly on vital questions now pending before the Senate. I ask to have it published in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE RESULTS OF TURNING FRUITS INTO WINE AND BRANDY.

[Prepared by Scientific Temperance Federation, of 36 Bromfield Street, Boston, Mass., Miss Cora F. Stoddard, secretary, June, 1917, for information of Congress.]

The proposal to leave the way open for the continued manufacture and sale of wines and distilled liquors from fruits is a proposal to open a Pandora's box of troubles from which the United States has been relatively free.

The total consumption of wines in the United States in 1850 was 6,316,371 gallons. In 1915 it was 32,911,909 gallons. But while the total consumption had increased fivefold, the per capita consumption in 1915 was but thirty-two one-hundredths gallon as against twenty-seven one-hundredths gallon in 1850. The highest per capita consumption of wine was sixty-seven one-hundredths gallon in 1909 and 1911. These figures show that up to now wine has constituted a relatively small part of our alcohol consumption, less than 3 per cent at the most.

The increase which has taken place in the total amount consumed is an increase in the use of domestic wines. The consumption of imported wines has remained fairly constant through all these years (6,095,000 gallons in 1850; 5,656,219 gallons in 1915), never rising above 10,000,000 gallons or falling below 3,000,000 gallons.

But the total consumption of domestic wines increased from 221,249 gallons in 1850 to a maximum of 9,863,735 gallons in 1915. (United States Statistical Abstract, 1915, p. 514.)

This indicates in a measure the development of the wine-producing industry, which began in Ohio shortly after 1850 and in the sixties was given a strong foothold in California, which is now the largest wine-producing section of the United States.

The emphasis laid by the wine producers upon what they call "light wines," which they urge as desirable "hygienic drinks" likely to promote "temperance," has obscured the fact that along with the development of the wine industry there has been an increased consumption of spirits made from fruits. The consumption of these fruit spirits (brandy, etc.) has increased from 1,223,830 gallons in 1870 to 2,516,054 gallons in 1915; that is, has practically doubled. (United States Statistical Abstract, 1915, p. 514.) This means that the development of wine production is accompanied by production of a form of spirits, brandy, which averages 45 per cent alcoholic strength—stronger in alcohol than the average whisky. (Report Committee of Fifty, p. 339.)

Furthermore, the wines themselves are by no means all "light wines." The report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue (1916, p. 17) shows that normally nearly 5,000,000 gallons of brandy are used in fortifying wines; that is, in increasing their alcoholic strength above the 10 to 13 per cent of alcohol obtainable by formulation. These fortified wines may contain from 15 to as much as 24 per cent of alcohol. That it is no small item to be considered appears in the fact that in 1915, an average year, there were 4,852,848 gallons of brandy used in fortifying 15,646,086 gallons of wine, resulting in 18,580,373 gallons of this stronger wine. (Report Commissioner Internal Revenue, 1916, p. 117.)

If fruits are exempted from the measure prohibiting the use of foodstuffs for the manufacture of distilled liquors, we not only leave the way open but give direct encouragement to the development of another spirits industry, which will draw from the food supply by taking fruits, and those some of the commoner fruits, necessary in several ways to the health of the people.

Anything that tends to reduce the available supply of these fruits, to make them expensive, either deprives the people of needed food constituents or compels them to seek them elsewhere through vegetables, grains, milk, eggs, etc., of which there is already a scarcity.

For health reasons, therefore, it is important that we should not encourage the greater use of fruits in making spirituous or various liquors as will be the case if we do not include fruits among the foodstuffs prohibited in the manufacture of alcoholic beverages.

Again, such exemption will encourage the making of stronger alcoholic beverages than those produced from grains. The lightest wine has, on the average, a larger alcoholic content than strong beer. The fortified wines, as already stated, contain from 14 to 24 per cent alcohol. Fruit brandy contains from 40 to 60 per cent of alcohol, as against from 40 to 50 per cent for whisky.

From the point of view of conserving man power as well as foodstuffs, we shall therefore gain nothing by opening the way to a larger production and use of wine and brandy. No one can doubt for a moment that if the use of grain is prohibited in the manufacture of whisky, rum, and fermented liquors, and the use of fruits is not prohibited, we shall see a lively increase of activity among the wine and brandy producers.

THE DRUNKENNESS OF HISTORY MOSTLY ON WINE.

There is nothing in the history of the nations that gives us any reason to suppose that this will be anything but a detriment to the efficiency of the Nation at a time when every particle of energy is required.

As long as human deeds have been recorded, whether in song and story or on stones, papyrus or printed page, the record has contained accounts of man's drunkenness. Edicts and exhortations against it are found in the most ancient writings of China, India, and Persia. In Egypt its origin is credited to Isis or Osiris. Pompeii had a statue of Bacchus. The Bible contains 58 references to drunkenness. It closed the career of Alexander the Great and many of the high and low in ancient Greece and Rome.

But the drunkenness of the ancients was wine, beer, or cider drunkenness. The accredited inventor of distillation died in 1106 A. D., hence whisky and other distilled liquors were not responsible for the intemperance of the olden times.

THE WOES OF WINE IN FRANCE.

At the beginning of the present war France abolished absinthe, but left her wine and brandy and other liquors. Here is a poster issued in 1916 by the French Society Against Alcoholism, the honorary president of which is M. Raymond Poincaré, the President of France:

L'ALARME.

[Société Francaise D'Action Contre Alcoolisme; Honorary president, M. Raymond Poincaré.]

To French Women and French Young People:

1. Alcohol is as formidable an enemy to you as Germany.
2. It has cost France since 1870 in men and in money more than the present war.
3. Alcohol pleases the taste, but, a veritable poison, it destroys the body.
4. Drinkers grow old early. They lose half their normal life and are easy prey to numerous weaknesses and maladies.
5. The "little glasses" of parents are transformed into hereditary weaknesses in their descendents. France has to-day about 200,000 insane, twice as many consumptives, to say nothing of the victims of gout, scrofula, rickets, premature degeneracy, and the majority of criminals.
6. Alcoholism reduces our productivity two-thirds, increases the cost of living and misery.
7. Like the criminal Kaiser, alcoholism decimates and ruins France to the great joy of Germany. Mothers, young people, husbands, fight alcoholism and remember the glorious wounded and dead for the country.
8. You will thus accomplish a great task, equaling that of our heroic soldiers.

This poster was approved by M. Clementel, minister of commerce, and was placed, by direction of the under secretary of the health service, in all offices under his direction. This is a French declaration after absinthe was prohibited—wine and spirits remain.

France and Italy have been through the experience that lies before us if we open the way to a large production of wine and spirits made from wine. After the grapevine pest, phylloxera, was conquered in France numerous regions previously devoted to grain were converted into vineyards. If France had this acreage still producing grain it would now be helping out her food supply. Overproduction of wine encouraged its conversion into spirits. To-day there are not far from 2,500,000 wine and cider producers, and a million home distillers. (Fréderic Riemain, secretary of Le Ligue Nationale Contre L'Alcoolisme, 1916), and these constitute a body of interests which have blocked every effort during the war to free France from the handicap which drink places upon her, as stated in the poster already presented. The French press publishes lively demands that the spirits be requisitioned and turned to military and industrial uses instead of into the stomachs of the people. "Alcohol," said Le Figaro a few months ago, "is at the same time one of the best aids to national defense in the powder mills, and one of its most cruel enemies in the stomachs of the workmen in war-industrial establishments. Who dares hesitate to chose between these uses?"

A recent book by Jean Finot, editor of La Revue, which has been passed by the censor, portrays some of the conditions with which France is struggling due to her wine-spirits interests. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, May 4, p. 1802.) It shows that the wine and spirits shops undermine the health and morals of the soldiers when off duty; drinking in convalescence retards or prevents recovery from wounds, increases infractions of discipline, handicaps employers in the production of munitions, delays transportation of supplies. Many of the generals have found it necessary to take measures to protect the soldiers at the front. Gen. Joffre forbade absolutely the sale of alcohol and of alcoholic drinks to soldiers of all grades in the army zone. He specified as forbidden "absinthe, bitters, vermouths, liqueurs, fruit spirits, and all other alcoholic liquids not specified." He forbade soldiers to accept as a gift any amount whatever of the drinks above named, and announced that any seller violating this rule would be brought before the police and military courts, and that he would go so far as to definitely close up establishments guilty of violating this decree. Such are the difficulties which France has had during the war after prohibiting what was believed to be her worst enemy, absinthe, and leaving wine, fruit spirits, and other drinks.

How was it before the war?

An official proclamation in Paris, as long ago as 1903, written by Dr. Débove, dean of the faculty of medicine, and Dr. Faisans, physician to the principal general hospital of Paris, declared that "alcoholism is cronic poisoning, resulting from the habitual use of alcohol, even when not taken in amounts sufficient to produce drunkenness. The so-called hygienic drinks—wine, beer, and cider—also contain alcohol; the man who daily drinks an immoderate amount of wine, of cider, or of beer becomes as surely alcoholic as the one who drinks brandy. Alcoholism causes a great variety of diseases. It is one of the most frightful scourges whether regarded from the point of view of the health of the individual, of the existence of the faculty, or of the future of the nation."

Such was the official warning given in wine and fruit-spirits drinking France 15 years ago.

A report to the French Academy of Medicine in 1907 by Dr. Fernet showed that among 1,500 deaths in hospitals and insane asylums in Paris, more than one-third were due in part to alcoholism; alcoholism was a contributory cause in 23.6 per cent of the cases, the sole cause in 10.2 per cent.

How cheapness and abundance of wine (such as would be fostered if we do not include fruits among the foodstuffs to be conserved) did not tend to promote temperance in France is shown by a survey by Ernest Massard in the St. Antoine quarter of Paris in 1901. Of 500 patients who came under his observation in the hospital, the average used from 4 to 5 quarts of wine a day; 56 who declared they were never drunk used from 1 to 2 quarts of wine a day and brandy, rum, and absinth in addition, and 400 of the 500 patients showed signs of alcoholism.

"The scourge of drink," wrote M. Bourgeois, an ex-cabinet minister, "has a permanent place in all our social miseries. We meet it everywhere. It hides itself behind tuberculosis, in insanity, in crime, but it is always at the bottom of our evils and degeneracies."

An enormous increase in tuberculosis in France has been one of the serious developments of the war in consequence of trench life and conditions. But long before the war physicians had called attention to the fact that statistics of the consumption of alcohol, according to departments in France, showed a parallel with those of tuberculosis. Dr. Jacques Bertillon declared that "alcohol appears to be the most deadly cause of the weakening of the organism in preparation for tuberculosis. It is the master cause. All other causes disappear in comparison." Dr. Roubinovitch, of the Saltpetriere, declared: "They talk about the great scourge tuberculosis which decimates France. The greatest scourge, however, is alcoholism. It is this which gives up the key to the house and permits the sacking. There is no more burning question than the battle against this cause of all other scourges." And again, Dr. Landowzy, in picturesque phrase, declared: "Alcoholism prepares the bed for tuberculosis."

Figures compiled in 1907 under the direction of the French ministry of the interior (La Sémaine Médicale, July 10, 1907) showed that of 71,551 inmates of insane asylums, 9,932, or 13.6 per cent, were there as the direct or indirect result of alcohol.

These facts are not cited as any derogation of our great ally, whose splendid spirit and achievements in this war we hail with honor. But they do show that the nation which has freely produced and used wine could not stop there, but passed on to the use of fruit brandy and worse liquors, and that it has suffered before the war and during the war from all the consequences that we had seen from other alcoholic liquors.

SWITZERLAND'S WARNING AGAINST WINE.

Switzerland, another wine-using country, found that alcoholism developed in alarming proportions.

In 1885 the Government took a Government monopoly of the manufacture and sale of distilled liquors, and has ever since appropriated a part of the profits to preventing drunkenness and the curing of inebriates. The use of brandy decreased as a result of the monopoly, but the use of wine increased from 38 liters per person in 1884 to 69 liters in 1898. One of the ardent advocates of the monopoly legislation, E. W. Milliet, of Bern, found on comparing the consumption of actual alcohol that during the five-year period 1880–1884 preceding the adoption of the spirits monopoly the average per capital consumption of actual alcohol was 14.3 litres. In the decade 1892–1902, although the consumption of distilled liquors had decreased, the consumption of wine had so greatly increased that the actual per capita consumption of alcohol had gained by 10 per cent and amounted to 15.78 liters per capita as against 14.3 liters before the impetus was given to wine-drinking by adoption of the spirits monopoly.

The actual increase was even greater, as during the interval thousands of Swiss had become total abstainers.

ITALY'S LESSON ON WINE PERILS.

Italy, too, a wine producing and using country, shows a growing tragedy from drink.

Dr. Leonardo Bianchi published, in Nuova Antologia (August, 1916), a long article on the development of the wine industry in Italy and its economic disadvantages to a country which has to import so heavily its grain supplies. He urges that there be no extension of vine cultivation, that vines destroyed by the phylloxera be not replaced, and that instead the land be used for the cultivation of wheat and other grains greatly needed by Italy.

But here, too, is a physical problem similar to that of France. "The problem for Italy," says Dr. Bianchi, "is not so much attention to acute alcoholism (drunkenness) as to chronic intoxication, which slowly and daily undermines the vigor of the country. In all such diseases as apoplexy, epilepsy, hysteria, general paralysis, progressive paralysis, insanity, and suicide alcohol holds a not insignificant place as a cause.

But, while he considers that only one-fifth of these deaths were attributed in part to alcohol, they mount into tens of thousands in a period of years. And "between these and perfect health of a race is a large zone which swarms with human weaklings, delinquents, those brutal to wives and children, deaf to the voice of conscience, and the children who suffer in the higher mental functions from the influence of alcoholic intoxication in the parents."

Dr. Gina Lombroso-Ferrero, daughter of the great criminologist Lombroso and wife of the historical Ferrero, says of alcoholism in Italy in a recent article:

"The whole drink problem is being grappled with determinedly in Italy at the present time. The recent increase in alcoholism has been so tremendous as to cause anxiety in Government circles and among people interested in social questions.

"The epidemic of alcoholism is all the more remarkable in a country like Italy because it was practically free from it 30 years ago. Our experts assign to the evil two main causes—the stupendous spread of industrialism employing machinery and overproduction by wine growers.

"From 1890, and still more from 1900 onward, the evil grew. Official statistics show that the quantity of wine consumed per inhabitant in 1884 was 72½ liters (a liter is slightly more than a quart); in 1905 it was 111½ liters. As to beer, the figures for 1879 are 0.50 liters per head, and for 1905 0.89. Consumption of distilled alcohol jumped from 0.49 per head to over 1 liter. These figures are in reality much below the truth, as they do not cover contraband or illicit drinking. The antialcohol league of Milan recently made a special inquiry, which showed that consumption per head of all forms of alcohol in Milan had increased threefold in 25 years.

"Parallel with this increased drinking runs a corresponding rise in the death rate, which was only 1.5 per 100,000 inhabitants in 1887 and which in 1909 had risen to 4 per 100,000.

"It follows as a matter of course that cases of insanity kept pace with the increase in alcoholic consumption. Dr. Paolo Amaldi, director of the Florence Asylum and one of the leaders of the Italian Anti-Alcohol League, who has for many years conducted a minute inquiry into the causes of insanity, has found that in the three years 1903–1905 out of a total of 38,764 asylum inmates (22,168 men, 16,596 women) the cases due to drink numbered 3,398 (3,075 men, 323 women). But these figures nearly doubled in the triennial period 1909–1911, the total inmates crazed through drink being 7,092.

"Crime, too, kept pace. The ministry of justice has issued statistics showing that in 1906 the proportion of crimes due to drink was 4.46 per cent; by 1909 it had risen to 6.41 per cent, with an increase in the number of condemnations from 6,468 to 9,302. In addition the courts found for the same year that drink caused irresponsibility for various offenses in 5,426 cases. On this aspect of the drink evil Lombroso wrote:

"'Crime grows apace with pauperism. The old saying, in the presence of every unsolved criminal mystery, "Look for the woman," might be completed, perhaps corrected, by adding "or the bottle." Prof. Ferrii discovered the curious fact that in France, while crimes of bodily injury diminished notably during a given period, they showed a marked increase in the month of November, which is the wine-gathering season. And Sciopis declared in our own Parliament that nine-tenths of the crimes committed in Italy were done in saloons.'"

Vance Thompson, the well-known journalist, in a recent book speaks out of personal observation of what has happened in France and Italy:

"The greater part of my life I have lived in wine countries. Always one remembers the best of life; the dirty and tragic parts slip out of mind. * * * And so with the wine lands. Go to the real facts of life, banish the haze of poetic fancy, and what you see is not the cannikin-clinking merriment of comic opera, but a sadder, drearier way of life.

"I am speaking of lands where the grapes grow, where wine is 'natural, pure, and cheap.' It is there at its best. The alcohol, always a poison, is, in its least harmful form, concealed in the beneficent juice of the grape—hidden in suavity and perfume. And what it does to the race of men, dwellers in sunlight, you know, for you have shuddered at these crippled and distorted generations, with their beggars and idiots, bearing one and all—to the eye of the physiologist—the stigmata of alcoholic penalties.

"'No drunkenness in southern Europe?'

"He who makes that statement speaks out of deep ignorance. He has never dwelt in the villages of Provence or wandered over the wide roads of Italy. You do not, I admit, see so wild and manifest a drunkenness as in the harsh, northern, spirit-drinking lands, but the southern drinker, making up in quantity what was wanting in the alcoholic strength of his beverage, reaches the same stage of physical impairment, begets the same poisoned offspring, dies in the same kind of alcoholic dissolution—to use the technical phrase. His moral corruption, as his physical degeneration, is slower in its progress, but statistics might be piled hospital-high to show it reaches the same end. * * *

"It was in my horoscope to watch for 20 years the growth of the alcohol habit in France. I saw the nation weary of the too feeble intoxicant of wine and take to strong drink. During those years the drinking of absinthe alone rose from an annual consumption of 1,000,000 gallons to over 5,000,000 gallons. The French race, with dangerous deterioration, turned from the slow poison of wine to the fiercer and more active of alcohol poisons—to the wilder alcohol of amers and absinthes.

"With what fine spiritual energy, born of battle peril, France drew herself back from the abyss of racial degeneration you shall see, but assuredly she was going—even as the wine boy is making for whisky drunkenness—toward the alcoholic deterioration which is national deterioration, which is national death.

"Let there be no doubt about it, the wine way to drunkenness is a way like any other. You say it is cleaner, with gayer prospects and brighter skies? Nine-tenths of that is cant and cheap apologia of second-rate, brandy-loosened poets. It is not a clean way, if you have followed the trail of the wine drunkard, home-faring."

Thus the experience of three wine-producing and wine-using countries show that wine production when encouraged tends to divert to this purpose land needed for other foods so long as the growers produce grapes for wine instead of for food or nonalcoholic drinks. In all three countries the tendency has been toward an increased use of wine leading to chronic alcoholism, with all its physical and moral waste of human power and efficiency. In both France and Italy, but especially in France, it has led to production and use of spirits which has intensified the evils of alcoholism and which to-day in the midst of this world war is a tremendous handicap in affecting the food supply, in reducing the present effectiveness of the nation, in reestablishing normal industrial relations, which must be restored as rapidly as possible, and in impairing the future generations.

HOW NOT TO DO IT.

For the United States now to leave open the way to these losses by giving the wine and fruit brandy industries an opportunity to enlarge and take the place of beer and whisky is to ignore the solemn lessons of experience, which are already written large in tragedy in the national life of these other nations.

If the United States really intends to stop waste of food and human power by alcohol it must include the prohibition of the use of fruits as well as of grain in the manufacture of liquor for beverage purposes.

THE COAL SITUATION.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I present a letter on the coal situation, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FUEL ENGINEERING CO. OF NEW YORK,
CONSULTING FUEL ENGINEERS,
New York, June 26, 1917.

Hon. JOSEPH S. FRELINGHUYSEN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: This company is retained in a consulting capacity in connection with the coal problem of industries consuming 3,000,000 tons of coal a year, and because of that connection we are taking the liberty of calling to your attention certain phases of the present national coal situation.

As you know, for months past the price of the coal used by our industries has been several times the normal price, and much emphasis has been laid upon the argument that this has resulted simply from the operation of the law of supply and demand. Representatives of the coal trade particularly have constantly talked shortage of coal, shortage of labor, and shortage of cars.

There has no doubt been a shortage of coal in the sense that there was a ready demand for all that was produced, but during these months we have been in touch through our field representatives and by correspondence with probably 1,000 industrial power plants, and have yet to hear of more than one case of a plant being shut down for lack of coal.

Without question, a greater supply of cars and of coal to fill them would relieve the situation somewhat, but the hue and cry about shortage of coal seems to have diverted attention from an even more important factor in the situation, and that is the almost universal practice of speculation in coal by miners and dealers.

Evidence obtained by the Federal Trade Commission and mentioned in its report to the House of Representatives, dated May 19, 1917, shows that these producers of coal have very generally refused this year to follow their usual custom of contracting with consumers for the delivery of their year's supply of coal.

The manufacturer's demand for coal is not a matter of choice but of necessity, and a failure of coal supply for even a day will entail great financial loss. This need has been met in the past by the custom of contracting for coal for periods of a year at least. The sudden breaking down of this established method of distribution has had the inevitable result of forcing our industries to bid against each other in a disorganized market for their daily requirements. This condition has not only produced exorbitant prices, but has made more difficult than ever before the use of discretion on the part of the buyer as to the character and quality of coal to be purchased, and this in many cases is a matter of extreme importance, for the design and operating conditions of the plant make imperative the choice of certain kinds of coal. From our daily experience with the coal problems of some 300 industrial plants, we are satisfied that while an increase in coal production and facilities of transportation would relieve the manufacturers somewhat, yet the full measure of relief needed can be obtained only by the regulation of the trade practices and the consequent elimination of much of the speculation in coal.

This latter remedy obviously can not be expected to come from within the coal trade, many of whose members have deliberately so conducted their business as to aggravate the situation and promote and increase speculation very greatly to their own profit.

The Federal Trade Commission has already conducted an impartial investigation of the coal situation, and it would seem that the imperative need of our manufacturers and public-service corporations can only be met by the prompt delegation by Congress of the necessary regulative power specifically to that commission.

It is a fact little understood by others than those who have been brought into immediate contact with the manufacturers' coal problem that the coal industry is vastly different from most of our great industries, where the product of many mines or mills has been standardized to some extent and classified into recognized grades. Coal is produced over wide areas, and varies so much in character or quality, or both, that a given plant may use satisfactorily one coal and have great difficulty with another coal produced within a very few miles of the first. There is an almost infinite variety, and no recognized classification of coal for commercial purposes into established grades. For this reason price regulation would seem to be, excepting in the case of anthracite, impossible, and from the viewpoint of almost all of the manufacturers with whom we have communicated very much less desirable than suitable regulation which will restore to them some reasonable assurance of getting deliveries of a chosen coal for some months in advance by means of contracts which can be enforced.

This relief in itself, by eliminating the daily auctioning of our coal supply, would, no doubt, produce a reduction in prices to a level more nearly in line with present values, and yet would leave in operation the normal economic forces which would adjust prices between various grades, kinds, and markets as no legislation could.

Yours, very truly,

G. B. GOULD, Vice President.

NEWS-PRINT PAPER INQUIRY.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I present a Senate resolution. I ask to have it read, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration. When it is read I want the privilege of the floor for about five minutes to explain it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 95), as follows:

Whereas pursuant to the resolution of the United States Senate of April 24, 1916, the Federal Trade Commission began the investigation of the combination existing among the manufacturers of news-print paper;
Whereas two reports have been made to the Senate by said commission, dated respectively March 3, 1917, and June 13, 1917;
Whereas said commission finds as a fact and reports that there exists a combination of paper manufacturers which extorts unreasonable prices, and that by reason of said combination free competition has been restricted, and that within the past year prices have been advanced to large consumers as much as $50 per ton and to small consumers in some cases as much as $180 per ton;

Whereas said commission has reported that by concerted action said combination of manufacturers has discouraged the production of print paper and has arbitrarily divided customers and territories among themselves, and thus limited and controlled competition;

Whereas said commission has further found and reported that because of said unfair and illegal practices small publishers have already been driven out of business, that more are likely to suffer the same fate, that large publishers will be financially ruined, and others rendered unable to make any profit from their legitimate business ventures;

Whereas all of said acts and practices are in violation of the laws of the United States prohibiting monopolies, restraints of trade, unfair practices, etc.;

Whereas the Government of the United States is a large consumer of news-print paper and as such is the victim of the illegal combination, practices, and extortions aforesaid; and

Whereas the Federal Trade Commission, in its report of June 13, 1917, expressly states that "the efforts of the commission to restore competitive conditions have failed," and the said illegal and oppressive practices are being continued: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Federal Trade Commission is hereby directed to inform the Senate of the United States with all due dispatch why it has not issued and caused to be served upon the offending persons and corporations aforesaid appropriate orders commanding them to desist from the said illegal and unfair practices to the end that the same shall be discontinued, and if not that appropriate proceedings may be had in the courts of the United States to enforce said orders of the commission.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, very briefly I want to state the situation and the purpose of the resolution.

Nearly 27 years ago Congress passed a law prohibiting "pools, trusts, monopolies, and combinations in restraint of trade." For violations of the law it provided severe penalties of fine and imprisonment.

The law has been amended from time to time, and has in numerous decisions of the courts been sustained in all its parts. In 1914 two laws were passed calculated to further enlarge and strengthen the antitrust act.

The first of these, known as the Clayton Act, provided as follows:

SEC. 2. That it shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce in the course of such commerce, either directly or indirectly, to discriminate in price between different purchasers of commodities, which commodities are sold for use, consumption, or resale within the United States.

Section 11 of the act confers authority to enforce compliance with the provisions of section 2 upon the Federal Trade Commission, except as to matters relating to carriers and banks. Provision is made in section 11 for summoning of the offending parties before the Federal Trade Commission, and in case the commission shall be of the opinion—that any of the provisions of section 2 have been and are being violated, it shall make its finding of fact * * * and shall issue and cause to be served on each person an order requiring him to cease and desist from such violations * * *. If such person fails to obey such order * * * the commission may apply to the Circuit Court of Appeals * * * for the enforcement of this order * * *. The court shall cause notice thereof to be served on such person * * * and shall have power to enter a decree affirming, modifying, or setting aside the order of the commission. The finding of the commission as to the facts, if supported by testimony, shall be conclusive. * * * The judgment of the court shall be final, except that the same shall be subject to review by the Supreme Court. * * * Proceedings in court shall be given precedence to all other cases pending therein and shall be in every way expedited.

I have been simply quoting the law for some moments.

A few days prior to passing the Clayton Act, Congress had created the Trade Commission, which was given authority to enforce section 2 of the Clayton Act.

Section 5 of the act creating the Federal Trade Commission provides that—

Whenever the commission shall have reason to believe that any person or corporation has been or is using unfair methods in commerce * * * it shall serve notice upon such person * * * and complaint stating these charges * * *; that a hearing shall be granted * * * the testimony taken * * *. If the commission shall find that the method of competition is prohibited it shall * * * order the corporation to desist from such method of competition. * * * If such person or corporation fails to obey such order * * * the commission may apply to the circuit court of appeals of the United States.

Thereupon the proceedings are substantially as outlined in the Clayton Act, just quoted.

When the Trade Commission act was being discussed its advocates earnestly proclaimed that it would stop all forms of unfair methods being employed or that might thereafter be employed by those engaged in interstate commerce. We were told that the Trade Commission would constitute a supreme court of commerce, and that pursuant to the great powers granted to it under the sweeping clause "unfair competition" it would restrain the evil customs and methods of those who were practicing extortion upon the public. The advocates of the commission asserted that it would be a court where the humblest citizen could come and demand justice against the financial or industrial overlords of the land and secure quick relief. Much, therefore, was hoped from the commission.

Mr. President, the resolution I have offered briefly sets forth the facts. More than a year ago the country was startled by the discovery that a great combination had suddenly raised the price of news-print paper, and that the combination seemed to have the great publishers and newspapers of the country so completely within its powerful grasp that they scarcely dared protest against its extortions.

The price of print paper was enormously advanced and demands of the most arbitrary character were made upon the great publications of the country. They were commanded to renew their contracts at prices arbitrarily fixed by the paper combination. When they protested they were threatened with ruin; they were given the alternative of the highwayman, "Stand and deliver" or suffer a worse fate.

Accordingly the publishers appealed to the Senate and that body asked the Trade Commission to investigate. Over a year has elapsed, during which period publishers have been compelled to pay an enormous tribute to their criminal masters.

Now, I call attention to the findings of this commission. I have already quoted the law.

On March 3, 1917, the commission filed its first preliminary report in which it found in substance (a) that the increased price of news paper was unjustifiable; (b) that competition among paper manufacturers had been restricted, and that "important manufacturers in the United States were banded together to secure unreasonable profits; (c) that some publishers had been put out of business and others were in danger of financial ruin; (d) that by concerted action between the manufacturers prices had been advanced from $40 a ton to over $90 a ton, and in some instances to $180 per ton; (e) that these prices were caused by the combination. On June 13, 1917, the commission further reported: (f) That in one year's time the conspirators had increased their profits by over $17,000,000; (g) that the efforts of the commission to restore competitive conditions in the news-print industry expeditiously and to arbitrate and effectively project a fair price for news-print paper have failed; (h) that some four of the manufacturers have been indicted upon evidence furnished by the commission; (i) that news-print paper is being sold at the same exorbitant prices that they obtained heretofore; (j) that there will be a repetition of the panicy market conditions of last year and the exaction of prices which are entirely out of measure with the cost of production.

The singular thing is that while the commission has had this case in hand for more than a year, and for a long time has been in possession of evidence that the conspirators have "discriminated in prices between different purchasers of commodities," it has never at any time issued an order to these conspirators commanding them to "cease and desist from the violation of the law." Astonishment is increased when we remember that the provisions of section 11 of the Clayton Antitrust Act are mandatory and impose upon the commission the duty to issue such order, the language of the act being "and shall issue and cause to be served on such person an order requiring such person to cease and desist from such violation."

We have the right also to know why the unfair practices which the reports abundantly show have been flagrantly employed have not been stopped. At the very least we should be told why the commission has not gone to the trouble of issuing an order that they shall stop.

The purpose therefore of this resolution is to ascertain why the commission has not proceeded in accordance with the command of the statute. Perhaps there may be an explanation which in all fairness the Senate must await.

Mr. President, I ask that the resolution may be considered at present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not object to the present consideration of the resolution; I do not object to the passage of the resolution; on the contrary, I would be very glad to see it adopted; but as the suggestions just made by the Senator from Missouri reflect somewhat upon those who were in favor of the bill creating a Federal Trade Commission, and reflect still more severely upon the Trade Commission itself, I believe that it is due to those of us who thought the Federal Trade Commission would perform an important duty in the industrial world and to those of us who believe that the Federal Trade Commission has discharged its duty with fidelity, to say a word before the resolution is put upon its passage.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, let me disclaim any purpose in the world of reflecting upon those who advocated the creation of this commission. On the contrary, I am bottoming my resolution upon the thought that much is expected of that commission.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is nothing in the resolution, Mr. President, that reflects on anybody, but there is much in the accompanying suggestions of the Senator from Missouri that indicate that he holds just the position now that he held then—that the commission was unnecessary and would be useless. I do not want that impression to go unanswered.

Mr. President, I have no doubt the report of the Federal Trade Commission, if its conclusions are well founded—and I believe that they are well founded—convict the paper manufacturers of the United States of the grossest violation of the antitrust law. I desire to suggest, however, to the Senator from Missouri that the facts which were found by the Federal Trade Commission, and which were reported to the Senate with great fullness, supported by an ample array of evidence, do not show that the paper manufacturers have violated the law which created the Federal Trade Commission or section 2 of the Clayton Act; and the Federal Trade Commission, in my opinion, has no other jurisdiction than to certify the matter to the Department of Justice for such proceedings as are required under the antitrust law. As I am informed, the commission long ago did certify to the Department of Justice the facts which had been developed, or in some way transmitted the evidence of those facts, and what has been done by the Department of Justice I do not know, although I think that some proceedings have been instituted against the paper manufacturers.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa is aware that a number of indictments have been found, is he not?

Mr. CUMMINS. I am so advised. Now, let us be fair with regard to this matter, so far as the Federal Trade Commission is concerned. The Clayton Act, which was read by the Senator from Missouri, so far as it relates to this particular matter, is as follows—I shall now put in a part of section 2 of the act:

SEC. 2. That it shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce, either directly or indirectly to discriminate in price between different purchasers of commodities, which commodities are sold for use, consumption, or resale within the United States or any Territory thereof or the District of Columbia or any insular possession or other place under the jurisdiction of the United States, where the effect of such discrimination may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent discrimination in price between purchasers of commodities on account of differences in the grade, quality, or quantity of the commodity sold, or that makes only due allowance for difference in the cost of selling or transportation or discrimination in price in the same or different communities made in good faith to meet competition: And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall prevent persons engaged in selling goods, wares, or merchandise in commerce from selecting their own customers in bona fide transactions and not in restraint of trade.

There is nothing in the report of the commission that even remotely indicates that the paper manufacturers have violated that section of the law.

Mr. REED rose.

Mr. CUMMINS. Just a moment. The whole report of the commission shows that the paper manufacturers of this country have combined in order to exact unreasonable prices for their commodities; and the general understanding, the general knowledge, which we have of the situation leads us to believe that those manufacturers have concerted together not to discriminate but to impose upon the business in which they are engaged all the characteristics of a monopoly and to exact such prices as they saw fit to exact.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. CUMMINS. I will yield in just a moment.

Mr. CURTIS. I want to ask the Senator if the report does not show that the paper manufacturers have discriminated?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not think it does.

Mr. CURTIS. It is a fact which has been established, that they have discriminated.

Mr CUMMINS. They may have discriminated—I do not know—but the mere fact that they sold one publisher paper at one price and they sold another publisher paper at another price does not show that they have discriminated under the law; but the report very clearly shows that they are compelling all publishers to pay an unreasonably high price for the commodity. They are enabled to do so because they have strangled competition as between themselves, and are therefore in a position to deal with the subject as though there were but a single manufacturer.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator pardon me now for interrupting him?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Iowa is in error when he states that the report of the commission does not show that the paper manufacturers have discriminated in prices. The report of the commission shows that they have charged different prices to the large newspaper men and have raised their prices to the small newspaper men, in some instances as high as $180 a ton. I was looking for the exact language, and I shall have it in a moment.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Missouri read the report, and it is now in the RECORD.

Mr. REED. Well, I am therefore a little surprised at, or, at least, I do not understand, the Senators' statement that there is nothing in the report to show that the manufacturers have discriminated in prices.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Missouri must not assume that because a manufacturer charges different prices to different purchasers therefore there is a violation of section 2 of the Clayton Act.

Mr. REED. Oh, no; I do not assume that; but I say that the true meaning of section 2 is this——

Mr. CUMMINS. No; Mr. President——

Mr. REED. It forbids——

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Well, of course, I can only interrupt the Senator with his consent.

Mr. CUMMINS. There may be a discrimination; I do not assert that there has not been a discrimination, which is forbidden by the Clayton Act, but I say that the report of the commission does not establish any such discrimination, nor was that the point of the inquiry. The point of the inquiry was, just as the Senator from Missouri has said when he forgot for a moment his prejudice against the commission, that these paper manufacturers are charging the people of this country excessive, extortionate prices for the things which they produce, and they are enabled to do it because they have entered into a combination which has substantially suppressed all competition in that line of business.

The Federal Trade Commission was not given authority to proceed against those who had strangled or annihilated competition. That authority was conveyed in the act of 1890, ordinarily known as the antitrust law, which made it unlawful to engage in any conspiracy or to enter into any agreement in restraint of trade, and the courts have held properly that the effort to eliminate competition from a business in order to enhance prices is an effort in restraint of trade.

The enforcement of that law belongs to the Department of Justice and it ought to belong to the Department of Justice. The Senator from Missouri would be no more willing to trust the enforcement of that law to the trade commission than I would be willing to take it from the officer who for nearly 30 years has had it in charge and give it to another department of the Government.

Having said so much in regard to section 2 of the Clayton Act, just a word in regard to the act creating the commission. The act creating the commission provided that it shall be unlawful to practice unfair methods of competition. The entire jurisdiction and power of the commission, so far as this act is concerned, is found in the first paragraph of section 5, which I read:

That unfair methods of competition in commerce are hereby declared unlawful.

Now, whatever "unfair methods of competition" may be—and there was a great deal of controversy with respect to the meaning of those words when the bill was being considered—no one will contend that combination and agreement to destroy competition among the competitors themselves, so that they may be able to impose unduly high prices upon the purchasers of the commodities, is an unfair method of competition. It is not competition at all; it is the death of competition; it is an agreement which eliminates all competition from the business to which the agreement is related.

Therefore, Mr. President, while I would be very glad to see the resolution passed, I think that the author of the resolution would get more information if he would include in it the Department of Justice as well as the Trade Commission.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, this is a very important matter. I have had occasion heretofore to make some investigation of it, and I should like to ask that the resolution go over until to-morrow. I do not wish to take the Senator from Iowa off his feet, but, unless he objects, I should like to have the resolution go over until to-morrow.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no objection to that course being pursued.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have consulted the author of the resolution, and I understand that course is agreeable to him. I myself should like to have an opportunity of submitting some data concerning the subject of the price of print paper and the activity of the manufacturers in regard to that matter. It is in my office. I had no notice that the resolution would be presented this morning. Therefore, I ask that it may go over.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am perfectly willing that it shall go over, but I am not opposed to the resolution. I should like to see the manufacturers prosecuted as they ought to be; but I want the Federal Trade Commission to have a fair and square deal in the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON and Mr. FLETCHER addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, before this matter is disposed of will the Senator from Arkansas yield to me for a moment?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. I desire to suggest that there be printed in the RECORD, in connection with what has been said here, the recommendations of the Trade Commission, as shown on page 141 of Senate Document No. 49, covering the points that have been involved in this discussion. The matter referred to is not very long. Perhaps it is not necessary to put in the conclusions of the commission, because the document is available; but their recommendations I think ought to appear, and also their recommendations with reference to book paper, which are to the same effect as their recommendations regarding news-print paper, as found at page 10 of Senate Document No. 45. I ask to have the matter to which I have referred printed in the RECORD in connection with the discussion this morning.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

SECTION 4. RECOMMENDATION.

The withdrawal of the largest manufacturers from the arbitration arrangement resulted in the failure of the effort of the commission to bring relief to the situation by voluntary cooperation of the interested parties. It therefore has decided to recommend as a war emergency measure that Congress by appropriate legislation provide:

(1) That all mills producing and all agencies distributing print paper and mechanical and chemical pulp in the United States be operated on Government account; that these products be pooled in the hands of a Government agency and equitably distributed at a price based upon the cost of production and distribution, plus a fair profit per ton.

(2) That pursuant thereto some Federal agency be empowered and directed to assume the supervision and control thereof during the pendency of the war.

(3) That by reason of the fact that approximately 75 per cent of the production of news-print paper in Canada comes into the United States, proper action be taken to secure the cooperation of the Canadian Government in the creation of a similar governmental agency for the same function, which shall be clothed with power and authority to act jointly with the governmental agency of the United States for the protection of the consumers and manufacturers of print paper and the public of the United States and Canada.

(4) That in case the Canadian Government shall not join in such a cooperative enterprise, then importation of paper and mechanical and chemical pulp into the United States shall be made only on Government account to or through the Federal agency charged with such supervision and distribution.

RECOMMENDATIONS.

Since the problems connected with the book-paper industry are similar to those disclosed by the news-print investigation, and since the book-paper industry is vested with a similar public interest, the commission has made its recommendations for remedying the news-print situation sufficiently broad to include the other grades of print paper designated as book paper. These recommendations were submitted to the Senate in its letter of submittal dated June 13, 1917.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, since the Senator from Arkansas has asked that this resolution go over, I am entirely willing that it shall go over until to-morrow. I can not, however, allow this moment to pass without some reply to the remarks of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. The truth is the Senator from Iowa is supersensitive in regard to the Federal Trade Commission. When we were creating that body the Senator was a very earnest advocate of it, as he had a right to be. I believed that the law as it was being phrased was not properly constructed, and I so expressed myself very often, as I had a right to do.

Over a year ago we gave to the Federal Trade Commission by Senate resolution the duty of investigating the news-print paper situation. The condition, which was apparent to everybody, was that the price had been enormously raised, and the question to be determined was whether that price was a just price, but especially whether that price had been brought about by any violation of law on the part of the paper manufacturers. So the whole matter was referred to the Federal Trade Commission; and it was referred to the Federal Trade Commission in the high hope and expectation on the part of the Senate and, I think, on the part of the country that speedy relief of some kind would be brought about, for it is to be remembered that the advocates of the commission claimed that it would afford speedy relief in all cases where relief was reasonably possible. A year elapsed almost to a day when the commission made a report. Subsequently it made a second report; and, Mr. President, I assert in both of those reports it showed a plain violation of the law, of the Sherman Antitrust Act and its various amendments, and it showed a violation of the Federal Trade Commission act, if that act means anything. If that phrase which we so much discussed, "unfair competition," means anything, then it would reach a combination between manufacturers to suppress all kinds of competition among themselves.

But there is another phrase that is found in the Clayton Act which forbids discrimination in prices between individuals, and I call attention to its language:

That it shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce—

And these gentlemen are engaged in commerce—

in the course of such commerce—

And that which they are doing is in the course of commerce—either directly or indirectly to discriminate in price between different purchasers of commodities, which commodities are sold for use, consumption, or resale within the United States—where the effect of such discrimination may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce.

And that is the case here—

That clause is turned over by the provisions of section 11 of the Clayton bill to the Trade Commission, and the Trade Commission has found this discrimination in price, and has found that that discrimination in price is ruinous; that it has driven out of business many of these concerns; and that it is going to greatly injure other concerns.

I do not agree to the logic of the Senator that the language of this act is so constructed that it does not reach discrimination in prices at all. I think it does reach that discrimination. Neither do I agree with his doctrine that the phrase "unfair practices" does not cover these particular acts that the commission has reported have taken place, unless, indeed, the Senator is prepared to take the position that the phrase "unfair practices" really is what it was denounced as being in the debates on the Federal Trade Commission bill, and which I said in those debates was the case, namely, a phrase without any real meaning. But I was overruled in that. The Senate and the entire Congress took the other view, the majority of them; so that you have that expression and you have these laws.

Now, here is what I want done: Under the law the Federal Trade Commission can issue an order commanding these conspirators—and it has found the conspiracy—these violators of the law—and it has found the violation—to desist in their evil practices. If they do not desist, then the Trade Commission has the right to file a proceeding in the Federal courts, and in that proceeding the interested parties may come in and be heard. But the Federal Trade Commission has never issued any such order.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. All that I am asking in this resolution is that the Federal Trade Commission shall be directed to tell us why it has not issued the order. If the Federal Trade Commission shall come to the Senate and say that it has no authority, no right, and no power, and that the issuance of an order therefore would be a thing beyond its jurisdiction, we will know at least the opinion of the Federal Trade Commission——

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. In a moment I will yield to the Senator—and we will be in a position to understand either one of two things: Whether the Federal Trade Commission is fulfilling its mission and duty under the law, or, upon the contrary, we will be given to understand that the law is lame and ineffective and that the commission really has no powers of any considerable value, and we will have the information upon which to base future legislation.

Nothing that I have said in my remarks or in this resolution constitutes a reflection upon the Federal Trade Commission, unless it be a reflection to state that the commission has reported in a certain manner, and the law is thus and so, and the inquiry arises why some action has not been taken. I want to give the Federal Trade Commission a fair show; but I say now, since the matter is up for comment, that a commission that has taken 12 months to report a state of facts that ought to have been found in 30 days and that finally ends by telling us that it can do nothing either needs more power or else we do not need the commission.

I now yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri, with his usual skill in argument, uses words which he may believe are the equivalent of the words used in the statute, but which in my opinion bear no relation whatever to the words used in the statute. I rose to call his attention to the fact that we had not intrusted the Federal Trade Commission with the suppression of unfair practices in business; and no one, I think, who was or is friendly to the law, has ever so contended. The words used are "unfair methods of competition." There are a thousand vicious practices in business.

Mr. REED. That are not methods?

Mr. CUMMINS. Again the Senator from Missouri either does not understand what I say, or he does not understand what he is saying.

Mr. REED. Perhaps I do not understand either.

Mr. CUMMINS. That may be so; I do not know. However, I acquit the Senator from Missouri of any want of comprehension or skill in determining the value of words. The statute does not say "unfair methods," even in business. It says "unfair methods of competition in business."

Now, it is palpable that we did not give to the commission this power with the expectation that through these words we could cure all the evils and dishonesties of business. No one ever dreamed of it, and I think the RECORD will show that no one ever asserted it. I repeat that in my judgment there is nothing in the report of the commission or in the facts which would convict these companies of unfair methods of competition, although the record is amply conclusive that they have violated in the most flagrant way a still more stringent statute, and one really of much wider operation, namely, the antitrust law.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa yield to me?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no right to do so. I am on the floor at the pleasure of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. NELSON. With the permission of the Senator from Missouri, then, I want to correct the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Minnesota always does that.

Mr. NELSON. No; I sometimes attempt it, but not very successfully. I call the attention of the Senator to section 11 of the Clayton Act:

That authority to enforce compliance with sections 2, 3, 7, and 8 of this act by the persons respectively subject thereto is hereby vested in the Interstate Commerce Commission where applicable to common carriers, in the Federal Reserve Board where applicable to banks, banking associations, and trust companies, and in the Federal Trade Commission where applicable to all other character of commerce, to be exercised as follows.

And then it proceeds. Now, section 2, over which they are given jurisdiction in the Clayton Act, reads as follows—the Senator from Missouri has already called attention to it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have read it twice.

Mr. NELSON. Well, that is as though it were incorporated in the original act creating the commission.

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. They have jurisdiction in all cases where there is a discrimination in prices.

Mr. CUMMINS. Why, certainly.

Mr. NELSON. And the Senator admits that there has been discrimination?

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I did not admit it. On the contrary, I said that the report did not show any discrimination.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator said the report did not show it, but he admitted that it might exist.

Mr. CUMMINS. It may possibly exist; I do not know. I did not admit it, however, because I do not know anything about it.

Mr. NELSON. I think it is a matter of common knowledge that there has been such a discrimination.

Mr. REED. Let me read this to the Senator, if he thinks there is any doubt about it. I read from the report of the commission.

Conditions in the newspaper-publishing business were reported by the commission in March as serious, and they continue to be serious. Within the year prices to large consumers of print paper have been advanced from about $40 per ton to over $60 and $70 per ton, and in some cases even up to $90 per ton—

There is a difference among large consumers of $30 a ton—

Also, by concerted action, the terms of contracts have been so changed as to shift a considerable financial burden from the manufacturers to the publishers. To some of the larger newspapers of the country this price increase means, in some instances, an increase in paper cost of hundreds of thousands of dollars. This in many cases will not only cause the loss of profits for the year but a serious financial embarrassment of the publication itself.

The smaller publishers have been forced to pay prices as high as $150 and $180 per ton. In addition to the above increase of prices among publishers of minor dailies and weeklies, it is complained that they found great difficulty in getting paper at any price, and to a large number of such publishers in the country the increase in the price means the difference between a living margin and the complete ruin of their business and the suspension of their publications.

The financial strength of great daily publications may enable them to survive. It is the smaller newspapers that will probably suffer the most seriously if these conditions continue. The small weekly and daily publications of the country particularly serve a great and useful purpose in the dissemination of facts and in the creation of an intelligent public opinion, and such disaster as impends by reason of this increase in the price of news-print paper makes the question one of great public concern.

Mr. President, the whole of the report is consistent with that statement, and the other report filed by the commission is consistent with it. For instance, in the report it is stated that the newspapers of the country have been robbed—it does not use that language, and I must be very accurate when I am quoting anything, I observe, with the Senator from Iowa in the humor he is this morning, so I will say this is my language—but they estimate that over $17,000,000 of additional profits have been taken out by the manufacturers in the last year by reason of these illegal practices. Then they state:

The efforts of the commission to restore competitive conditions in the news-print industry expeditiously and to arbitrate and effectively project a fair price for news-print paper have failed.

Now, it is a little curious to know why they were making an effort to restore competitive conditions if they had no authority or jurisdiction under the law to enter upon that field of activity.

It seems that the argument of the Senator from Iowa amounts to this: That when there are a lot of print-paper manufacturers engaged in competing with each other, if they should enter into any kind of an arrangement to restrict commerce, it would be within the jurisdiction of this commission, and they could stop it; but if they all enter the combination, thereupon, the iniquity having been consummated or the conspiracy having been made complete, so that it is in thorough working order, competition having actually ceased, the jurisdiction and authority of the commission to protect us in any way has likewise ceased. Now, if that is a correct exposition of the law, then there ought to be an amendment to the law; and I am asking for this commission to tell us why it has not proceeded.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is not my exposition; it is the Senator's.

Mr. REED. Oh, well, if it is not the Senator's, of course I am in the intellectual subcellar. I can not understand the Senator. He states that I am not capable of that, nor capable, hardly, of understanding myself; but he will find some difficulty in explaining to the people of the United States that this Trade Commission is a virile, living, forceful thing, and that it can not reach a condition such as I have spoken of and such as it reports.

The other proposition is "unfair practices." The Senator objects to the term I use there. Speaking offhand, I believe I said "unfair practices," and I believe that the correct phrase, the one that I should have employed, is "unfair methods of competition in commerce." Now, of course there is a whole lot of difference between unfair practices in competition in commerce and unfair methods of competition in commerce. It would require an expert, I think, to find any real difference in the two words.

I repeat, Mr. President, as this matter is to go over, this is what I want to get at. I have no desire to injure the Trade Commission. It exists. My fight on it quit when it was created. I have no fight on it now. But whenever it is determined in the Senate that the Federal Trade Commission has no authority to reach such an outrageous condition as has been reported by that commission to exist in the present case, then I either want the law amended so that it shall be given some power, or I want this country saved the expense of maintaining such a tribunal.

PROTECTION OF MIGRATORY BIRDS.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I understand the resolution has gone over, and I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 1553) to give effect to the convention between the United States and Great Britain for the protection of migratory birds concluded at Washington August 16, 1916, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection.

Mr. ROBINSON. I will say to the Senator from Arizona that I yielded the floor to the Senator from Missouri, who desired to continue his discussion. I rose to ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the so-called daylight-saving bill, which is Senate bill 1854. I was called out of the Chamber for a moment.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The Senator has a right to the floor. I would not wish to take advantage of his temporary absence.

Mr. ROBINSON. I thank the Senator from Arizona very cordially. I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. In the meantime the Senator will let me give notice that I shall ask the Senate at the close of the session this evening to adjourn and not take a recess, and I shall move to take up for consideration in the morning hour to-morrow Senate bill 1553, to carry out the treaty of 1916.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1854) to save daylight and to provide standard time for the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. NELSON. Let us hear the bill read.

Mr. NEW. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is objection. The morning business has not been concluded.

CANTONMENT OF NINTH DIVISION.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, if it be in order, I desire to call up Senate resolution 94, which I submitted yesterday, and I ask for its consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is in order.

Mr. THOMAS. In the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, I move that the resolution be referred to that committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado moves that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask for a division.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask that the resolution may be read, so that the Senate may know what it is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read Senate resolution 94, submitted yesterday by Mr. NEW, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, directed by the Senate of the United States, if not inconsistent with interests of the public service, to transmit to the Senate the reports of the board of officers appointed to select and designate the site for the cantonment of the ninth division, comprising the States of Indiana and Kentucky, together with the report and recommendations relating to its selection made by Gen. T. H. Barry, commanding general, Central Department, United States Army.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, this resolution, it will be noticed, calls for the submission of certain papers and certain reports to the Senate for which I think occasion has arisen. It is a fact that the ninth division for raising the National Army is composed of the States of Indiana and Kentucky, and I believe it is a fact that when the matter of selecting a site for the cantonment for the accommodation of the troops in that division was ordered a board of Army officers was appointed to consider those sites and recommend the adoption of one. This board, as I am reliably informed, did make a report to Gen. T. H. Barry, commanding the central division. My information is further to the effect that it recommended three sites in the State of Indiana in this order: First, Huntington; second, Terre Haute; and, third, Jeffersonville; that thereafter it named two sites in Kentucky, one at Lexington, and the other at Louisville. I am not certain of the order in which the two Kentucky sites were recommended.

Further, as I understand and believe to be the fact, Gen. Barry in submitting that report saw fit to differ with it and to recommend that Lexington be selected as the site. Later. when his report was submitted to the War Department, the whole question was taken up in the department, and the recommendation of all set aside and Louisville selected. But I believe it will be found to be the case, Mr. President, that Louisville was not recommended by any military authority up to the time when the report reached the department here in Washington.

Mr. President, I want it to be strictly understood that I have no charges to make against anybody or against any site, but it is true that at least one very reliable newspaper in the State of Kentucky has made certain very direct charges against the Louisville site. I should like to read, for instance, just a line—I am not going to read much—from this paper.

Mr. POINDEXTER. What paper is it?

Mr. NEW. It is the Lexington (Ky.) Herald of June 17. It says:

Louisville counted on political influence and won. Mr. Sackett, the president of the board of trade, stated in interviews in the Louisville papers that Louisville's victory "was due to Representative SWAGAR SHERLEY." The Louisville Times, the half sister of the Courier-Journal, stated that Mr. SHERLEY "informed the War Department that he would not permit Louisville to be turned down," with the qualifying phrase "when it had been shown that the city was in every way the best qualified for the camp."

Mr. President, Indiana wants to be a good loser. Up to this point Indiana has never entered into this controversy at all, but I believe it to be a fact, as I stated a few minutes ago, that three Indiana sites were named in preference to any of the Kentucky sites by this board appointed for the purpose.

Mr. President, if that board of officers was incompetent, it should never have been appointed. If it was competent, its recommendation should have been approved.

Mr. JAMES. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. NEW. Certainly.

Mr. JAMES. Upon what authority does the Senator make the statement to the Senate that the Army Board recommended three sites in Indiana as being preferable to that of Louisville?

Mr. NEW. I have very excellent authority for it.

Mr. JAMES. Would the Senator object to giving it?

Mr. NEW. I would prefer at this time not to give it.

Mr. JAMES. As the Senator prefers not to give the authority and as he has asked for this information, he ought to have awaited the disclosure of the report before he arraigns the War Department for making a selection that was not recommended.

Mr. NEW. I have said, Mr. President, that I have no charges to make, but since the Senator has asked me for my authority I will state that I am that authority. I have seen that report, or what professes to be the report.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. NEW. I will.

Mr. ROBINSON. The statute empowers the Secretary of War to determine the matter, does it not? In other words, the Secretary of War is not precluded from selecting Louisville as the site because some subordinate recommended another place.

Mr. NEW. Oh, I think not. I think the Secretary of War has that authority.

Mr. ROBINSON. Does the Senator from Indiana contend that the site at Louisville is not an appropriate place for the location of the cantonment?

Mr. NEW. No, sir; the Senator from Indiana said——

Mr. ROBINSON. Does the Senator from Indiana concede then that the action of the Secretary of War and the War Department in locating the cantonment for that district at the city of Louisville was in accordance with proper conduct?

Mr. NEW. No; I do not make any such concession.

Mr. ROBINSON. But he does concede that it was an appropriate place to locate it?

Mr. NEW. If the Senator will permit me, I said that the Secretary of War has that authority.

Mr. ROBINSON. I asked the Senator also if he concedes that the site at Louisville was an appropriate place for the location of the cantonment, and he said it was.

Mr. NEW. Yes; under certain circumstances.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator permit me another question?

Mr. NEW. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. I assume the Senator was advocating and attempted to induce the War Department to locate the cantonment in the State of Indiana. Is that correct?

Mr. NEW. It was not. It is not correct.

Mr. ROBINSON. Did the Senator make any recommendation or suggest to the War Department or to any officer who had the power to make the location?

Mr. NEW. For the site in Indiana?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes.

Mr. NEW. I did not.

Mr. ROBINSON. Then the Senator in reading a newspaper report charges that the location of the cantonment at Louisville was due to undue influence, as I understand it, of the Representative from the Louisville district, Hon. SWAGAR SHERLEY, who is a Member at the other end of the Capitol. Was that the import of the Senator's charge?

Mr. NEW. I did not understand the Senator. I was spoken to here and I did not understand just the way the Senator put the question.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator read some newspaper statement which I myself did not hear completely, but I understood the newspaper statement to contain a declaration that the location of the cantonment at Louisville was due to the influence of a Member of another branch of Congress.

Mr. NEW. I did read such a statement.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator read that statement?

Mr. NEW. I did.

Mr. ROBINSON. Does the Senator make that charge?

Mr. NEW. I said distinctly a minute ago that I did not make any charge.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator be kind enough to inform the Senate why he read a statement of that sort unless he did mean to imply or charge that the Hon. SWAGAR SHERLEY had unduly influenced the department to make the location?

Mr. NEW. I certainly will.

Mr. ROBINSON. I shall be very glad to have the Senator do it. I want to know.

Mr. BECKHAM. Mr. President——

Mr. NEW. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky for a question.

Mr. BECKHAM. I wish to say to the Senator from Indiana in regard to this matter that Representative SHERLEY has told me that never at any time did he make such a statement as was quoted here in the paper read by the Senator. Mr. SHERLEY, and I get it from him direct, never asked the War Department or the Secretary of War that the cantonment should be located at Louisville unless the department found Louisville to be a suitable and desirable site. The statement quoted in the newspaper as coming from Mr. SHERLEY, he told me, was never at any time uttered by him, or anything like it.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, I want to be absolutely fair in this matter. I wish to say that in a conversation I had with the Secretary of War after these charges were made the Secretary said to me that hearing from anonymous sources, not from this Lexington newspaper, but from anonymous sources, that complaint had been made of the insanitary condition of the Louisville site, he had had the War Department send an engineer officer there to make a report on it, and that that officer had gone and had come back and had made a report in favor of the site.

I want to be fair to the Secretary, and I want to be fair to everybody else in what I have to say, and I repeat for the benefit of the Senator from Arkansas or anybody else that I have no specific charges to make.

But, Mr. President, here is an article printed by a reputable newspaper of orthodox Democratic politics in the State of Kentucky, which makes all the charges that I have spoken of here and a great many more, which for good reasons I am not going to quote or refer to at this time.

But I think, Mr. President, in view of what has been said it is due to the Senate and due to the people whose boys are going to that camp site to know the facts about it. I wish to read one other article. The editor is a responsible man. He says:

> Under the circumstances of its location at Louisville citizens and officials of Lexington and Fayette County felt it their duty to call the attention of the Secretary of War to the facts, under the belief that they owed that obligation to the Secretary of War and to the men who will be sent to the camp, as every man owes an obligation in time of war. The editor of the Herald thoroughly approves that action, which he advised; he gladly assumes full responsibility and whatever of blame anyone may wish to place upon him for that action. He stands ready to maintain his position before the bar of public opinion, before a commission of Army officers, before the Secretary of War, if need be before the President or a congressional investigating committee.

Mr. JAMES. If I understood the Senator correctly, he stated that he had seen the report of the Army board and that that report recommended three sites in Indiana as preferable to any site in Kentucky.

Mr. NEW. Yes; I saw what purported to be the report of Gen. Barry transmitting the report of those officers.

Mr. JAMES. The Senator did not answer my question. Did that report recommend the sites in Indiana as preferable to those in Kentucky?

Mr. NEW. Yes; it named them in order, first, second, and third, and then I have forgotten whether Louisville or Lexington was fourth or Louisville or Lexington the fifth. I have forgotten the order, in other words, in which they came.

Mr. JAMES. Not that the site should be located in Indiana, but it made certain recommendations and as to Kentucky certain others.

Mr. NEW. I do not so recall it.

Mr. JAMES. Did the Senator see the report of Gen. Barry?

Mr. NEW. I did. I saw what purported to be his report.

Mr. JAMES. I will say, Mr. President, that the Senator was much more fortunate in seeing the reports of Army officers and generals and those in the War Department than I have been. I was informed that those reports had not been made public. I was not allowed to see the reports, but, on the contrary, I was given to understand that those reports were confidential communications and would not be made public, because if they would give publicity to statements as to why one locality was not the proper place for the building of a cantonment and why another was it would tend to disturb conditions and bring criticism and probably cast a reflection unjustly upon localities.

Mr. NEW. I have not said where or under what circumstances I saw that report. I repeat that I saw it.

Mr. President, with further reference to this matter this paper goes into great detail. It says that the Louisville site is insanitary. It quotes engineers, not Army engineers to be sure, but private engineers, as reporting that it is insanitary; it speaks of it as ground good for snipe hunting, and says that if that site is occupied by troops this fall and winter it will be nothing much better than a mudhole, and all that sort of thing.

Mr. President, I do not know that that is true——

Mr. JAMES. But, Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. NEW. I do not say that it is true, but if the Senator from Kentucky will allow me to proceed for just a moment——

Mr. JAMES. Very well.

Mr. NEW. This is true, Mr. President, that a good many thousands of young men from the State of Indiana, which I have the honor in part to represent here, are going into that camp within the next few days, comparatively, to stay there for a good many months. They are willing to go into this war, to death, if necessary; they will ask no special favors, and particularly those troops that are going from Indiana; but, Mr. President, they are entitled to the best that the Government of the United States can give them in the way of camp sites; and I, for one, should feel that I was recreant to a trust if I did not do the best I possibly could as a man and as a Senator to see that that right is secured to them. I once more repeat, I have no charges to make against the sanitary condition of that site or anything of that sort; I do not know these things to be true; but here is a responsible newspaper, a responsible editor, making all sorts of charges, of which those that I have mentioned here are but a small part, and calling for a congressional investigation. I think that if a commotion exists in the State of Kentucky over the rivalry between two points—Louisville and Lexington—as to which should have had that camp site, that it is all unnecessary, inasmuch as both of them came secondary to three sites in the State of Indiana, which were recommended in preference to either of those two.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, that is really the reason for the Senator's resolution, as I take it; but I want to ask the Senator this question: Is it not true that, after this complaint was made as to the Louisville site being insanitary, the Secretary of War, before he finally made this location, directed Gen. Gorgas to send his Army physicians there to make a thorough and complete investigation as to the sanitation of the site, and that they reported that it was as good as could be found in Kentucky?

Mr. NEW. Yes.

Mr. JAMES. And, of course, that means better than could be found anywhere in Indiana. [Laughter.]

Mr. NEW. The Secretary of War dealt in facts and not in fancies or vagaries, Mr. President; and up to a certain point he did tell me what the Senator from Kentucky states, and I so stated here in my remarks a little while ago. I said I wanted to be fair in this matter, and I do; but, Mr. President, as I said, there are a good many other things in connection with this matter which have been charged. I therefore think it is due to the Senate, I think it is due to the people of Indiana, to the people of the country, and to the boys who will be sent to this camp that we should know the facts. If these newspaper charges are true, let us know it; if they are untrue, let us quiet the apprehensions of the people who have been aroused by them, and who at this time are justly apprehensive, by disproving them before a congressional investigating committee, if necessary; but let us have the facts.

Mr. THOMAS obtained the floor.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, before the Senator from Colorado makes his statement, if he will permit me, I desire to say that, so far as I am concerned—and I am satisfied I speak for my colleague [Mr. BECKHAM] and for the Representative from Kentucky, Mr. SHERLEY—we have not the slightest objection, as I feel that no one in Louisville or in Lexington, and no one in the State of Kentucky has, to the fullest and most complete investigation that the Senate desires to make in regard to this matter. If the Senate wishes to undertake to investigate all of these rivalries, where one of the defeated wants to bring before Congress his complaint, we have not the slightest objection to it.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I do not think this resolution ought to be entertained. It may be entirely agreeable to the Senators from the two States interested in the purpose of the resolution that it should be adopted, but I object to it because it relates to a subject of national importance and because, if adopted, it will operate as a precedent for the introduction and adoption of similar resolutions designed for the investigation of the conduct of the War Department in its selection of cantonments for the other districts into which the United States has been divided for military purposes.

Mr. President, we are in the midst of a great war, and our first duty is to organize and equip our Army, and to do so as rapidly and as efficiently as possible. The very first step that must be taken, and which has been taken, is the selection of points where the training camps are to be erected, because every one of them has to be built. The work of construction is from the ground upwards; we have no structures, no cantonments anywhere of sufficient dimensions to accommodate thirty-seven or thirty-eight thousand men, that being approximately the number into which each of our units is to be divided. The construction is, therefore, a most Herculean task even for a nation with our resources. The work must necessarily be carried on with a speed and an energy that minimize the important question of cost, and certainly which minimize the question of locations after they are made.

Mr. President, we have got to trust somebody in making these selections. That responsibility has been given to the Secretary of War and those under him. I am satisfied that these authorities have done the best they could. My State was an active bidder for one of these cantonments. The chambers of commerce of the various cities finally united upon Colorado Springs, whose advantages of location the entire country knows, and which would have made a most admirable point for the mobilization of the unit of which the State of Colorado forms a part. The selection of the cantonment was fixed at Fort Riley, Kans. Our people protested in some degree, but not to the extent of calling the subject to the attention of Congress. I am sorry that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] has seen fit to do so in this instance, because, Mr. President, the dissatisfaction which necessarily results and the disappointment which ensues in every community which is an aspirant for favors like this, and which has failed to get them, will necessarily and naturally find expression in the desire for a congressional investigation, once the first step has been taken. What will be the result? While we are mobilizing our armies, while we are drafting our young men, while we are putting up structures, while we ought to be bending every energy toward the work of efficient preparation, we are going to be engaged in a lot of miserable wrangles with regard to the motives which finally actuated the powers that be in their selection of certain places and in their rejection of others. It is unseemly at this time, Mr. President; it is wrong; and I hope the Senate will meet the first effort to carry out such an investigation by denying it, by rejecting the resolution altogether.

Mr. BECKHAM. Mr. President, as my colleague [Mr. JAMES] has stated, I have no objection to the passage of this resolution, nor do I, nor does anyone whom I represent, object to the fullest inquiry into this matter.

It is true, Mr. President, that there have been some very keen rivalries about the selection of sites for the location of the military cantonments. The War Department undoubtedly had a very difficult and a very serious task to perform in selecting the proper places, with due regard to all of the conditions necessary in establishing such cantonments.

The charges which the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] has read from a Kentucky newspaper were laid before the War Department prior to a final decision being rendered selecting Louisville as one of the sites; and, as I am informed, the Secretary of War, through the medical branch of the service, sent qualified experts to Louisville to make a thorough inspection, in addition to the investigation which had already been made. This board reported back to the Secretary of War that in the matter of sanitation and in other respects the site at Louisville was suitable for the purpose contemplated.

There were several Kentucky towns seeking the location of this cantonment, the chief of them being Louisville and Lexington. The rivalry between those two communities was very active, and as between them my colleague and I took no part. We were anxious to see one of these cantonments located in Kentucky, and we believed that both of these places were admirably adapted for such a purpose.

It seems that Indiana also had some aspirants for this cantonment, notwithstanding the fact that in Indiana is already located an Army post or camp, Fort Benjamin Harrison, where many thousands of men are now being trained as officers. There is also located in that State a quartermaster's depot, at Jeffersonville. I can see that, other things being equal, and Kentucky presenting a site that was suitable for such a purpose, the War Department might well have selected a location in Kentucky as the site of a cantonment in preference to Indiana.

Mr. President, I do not care to take up any more of the time of the Senate in the discussion of this matter. I do not think it is of sufficient importance. I have never had the opportunity of seeing the report, as the Senator from Indiana has; but I do not object, if the Senate wishes to dignify this resolution with such importance, to having it pass and request a report from the Secretary of War, so far as he can, with due regard to the public service, make such report.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, I tried to make it clear when I was on my feet a short while ago that Indiana did not enter into this protest at all until after it was lodged by Lexington against Louisville. Indiana is a good loser, when it comes to that. She wants to play the game fairly, but she wants the game played fairly all around. She will play fairly with anybody any kind of a game in which she engages.

Just a word, Mr. President, about Indiana in this connection. I want to call attention to the fact that Indiana in the great emergency which now confronts us was the first State to report to the Provost Marshal General of the Army that her machinery for bringing into being the army under the conscription law was in working order and that she was ready to proceed. She is not less than fourth among all the States in having furnished volunteers for the Regular Army; and Indiana's place generally is second to no State in the country, so far as her record is concerned. But, Mr. President, a State with that record is entitled to absolute fairness when it comes to the selection of a site for a cantonment for the Army. If it be true that a board of Army officers, appointed by the authority, of course, of the Secretary of War, as all such authority comes ultimately from him, acting without prejudice, recommended three Indiana sites before recommending any sites in any other State, I think that Indiana can claim in fairness that she should have had that cantonment. That, however, is not now the point.

Mr. JAMES. But, Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, perhaps what we need in a case like that, of a recommendation of three Indiana sites over those in Kentucky, would be an investigation of the board that made such a report.

Mr. NEW. Possibly the Senator is right, and I will amend my resolution so as to ask for that investigation, if the Senator prefers. What I want to secure is all the facts; that is all.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I do not think the Senate is at all concerned in the competition between States as to the location of these cantonments or camp sites. I think the question the Senate should be deeply interested in, so as to avoid any controversies in the future, is whether or not these sites are healthful. In the Spanish-American War there was a camp site located a few miles from this Capitol, at Falls Church, Va., known as Camp Alger. When the medical officers tested the wells at that site, as I remember, 9 out of 12 were found to contain typhoid bacilli.

I think the people of this country are deeply interested as to whether or not the locations selected by the War Department are healthful, and that is the principle involved in this resolution. I think, therefore, it is very important for the Senate to ascertain what the report of these officers, particularly the medical officers, was as to the healthfulness of this location. I agree with the Senator from Colorado——

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Yes.

Mr. JAMES. Probably the Senator was not in the Chamber at the time, but the Senator from Indiana himself stated that the Medical Department, under the direction of Gen. Gorgas, had decided, after an investigation, thorough and complete, that the Louisville site was a thoroughly sanitary site.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, as I read the resolution, it does not raise the question of the selection of this camp site; it simply calls for the papers connected therewith and the reports of the officers, including the medical officers, so that the Senate may satisfy itself as to the report of those officers, particularly the medical officers.

I think the resolution ought to be adopted to show the country that the Senate is interested in the healthfulness of the camp sites and in the proper administration of the War Department, particularly the medical branch of the service, in connection with the selection of camp sites.

Mr. WEEKS and Mr. HITCHCOCK addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I think the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] has correctly stated the case when he says that the Senate is not interested in a controversy between the States of Indiana and Kentucky or between two cities in the State of Kentucky as to the location of one of these camps; but it is interested in having the camps located in healthful places; and, more than that, this is one of the first of many similar resolutions which are likely to be introduced. We are engaged in the expenditure of enormous amounts of money.

Local rivalries and other considerations are going to be acute, and they are going to be brought to the attention of Congress, and there are going to be charges of unfairness—charges which should be answered for the protection of the public officers who have in charge the carrying out of the law in such cases.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. WEEKS. I do.

Mr. VARDAMAN. May I ask whether any of these officers have objected to answering the charges?

Mr. WEEKS. I am not aware that they have. It is a question of the passage of a resolution to investigate the matter.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I was not in the Chamber when the resolution was read. After the Senator finishes I will ask that it be read.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Mississippi that I stated that I had not the slightest objection to the fullest and most thorough investigation.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Oh, I am sure the Senator has not.

Mr. JAMES. And my colleague [Mr. BECKHAM] stated the same thing.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I am sure of that.

Mr. JAMES. I did not want the Senator to get the impression that the Senators from Kentucky were undertaking to prevent any investigation or to keep the Senate from having all of the recommendations made in regard to this site.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I am quite sure that neither the Senators from Kentucky nor any other Senator would have any objection.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I do not know anything about this case, but I think here is a good opportunity to make an investigation and answer what seem to be public charges and to discourage, if it is needed, the same kind of an attempt being made in case there is not a sound foundation for the charges being made. We will have a multitude of similar cases unless we indicate a willingness to investigate and get at the real facts. For that reason it seems to me that this resolution ought to be passed unanimously, and let us find out whether there is any basis for the contention that is made.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I want to say that I have absolute faith in the skill and the learning of the Chief Surgeon of the Army, and I have absolute faith in his integrity. I believe that the Army generally are avoiding the mistakes and the pitfalls that the country suffered from in 1898. I think every precaution is being taken to preserve the health of the Army, and it is very proper that it should.

I do not know anything about the facts upon which this resolution is based or the facts that inspired it, but I sincerely hope that no objection will be made to its passage, that it will be permitted to pass and let the sunlight of publicity blot out every possible cloud that might rest upon the conduct of the officers of the Army and the country generally.

Personally I want to repeat I have absolute faith in the integrity, the patriotism, the skill and the accomplishments of the Chief Surgeon of the Army, and I do not believe he would consent to the selection of any camp that did not have all that is necessary in the way of pure water and pure air and everything else necessary to the preservation of the health of the Army.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] to refer the resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

LEGALIZING STANDARD TIME.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I now renew my request that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 1854, commonly called the daylight-saving bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1854) to save daylight and to provide standard time for the United States, which had been reported from the Committee on Interstate Commerce with an amendment.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That, for the purpose of establishing the standard time of the United States, the territory of continental United States shall be divided into five zones in the manner hereinafter provided. The standard time of the first zone shall be based on the mean astronomical time of the seventy-fifth degree of longitude west from Greenwich; that of the second zone on the ninetieth degree; that of the third zone on the one hundred and fifth degree; that of the fourth zone on the one hundred and twentieth degree; and that of the fifth zone, which shall include only Alaska, on the one hundred and fiftieth degree. That the limits of each zone shall be defined by an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission, having regard for the convenience of commerce and the existing junction points and division points of common carriers engaged in commerce between the several States and with foreign nations, and such order may be modified from time to time.

SEC. 2. That within the respective zones created under the authority hereof the standard time of the zone shall govern the movement of all common carriers engaged in commerce between the several States or between a State and any of the Territories of the United States, or between a State or the Territory of Alaska and any of the insular possessions of the United States or any foreign country. In all statutes, orders, rules, and regulations relating to the time of performance of any act by any officer or department of the United States, whether in the legislative, executive, or judicial branches of the Government, or relating to the time within which any rights shall accrue or determine, or within which any act shall or shall not be performed by any person subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, it shall be understood and intended that the time shall be the United States standard time of the zone within which the act is to be performed.

SEC. 3. That at 2 o'clock a. m. of the last Sunday in April of each year the standard time of each zone shall be advanced one hour, and at 2 o'clock a. m. of the last Sunday in September in each year the standard time of each zone shall, by the retarding of one hour, be returned to the mean astronomical time of the degree of longitude governing said zone, so that between the last Sunday in April at 2 o'clock a. m. and the last Sunday in September at 2 o'clock a. m. in each year the standard time in each zone shall be one hour in advance of the mean astronomical time of the degree of longitude governing each zone, respectively.

SEC. 4. That the standard time of the first zone shall be known and designated as United States standard eastern time; that of the second zone shall be known and designated as United States standard central time; that of the third zone shall be known and designated as United States standard mountain time; that of the fourth zone shall be known and designated as United States standard Pacific time; and that of the fifth zone shall be known and designated as United States standard Alaska time.

SEC. 5. That all acts and parts of acts in conflict herewith are hereby repealed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The committee reports one amendment to the bill, which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. The committee proposes to insert a new section after section 4, as follows:

SEC. 5. That this act take effect and be in force from and after January 1, 1918.

And the numbering of section 5 is changed to 6.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the committee.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I should like to know what effect that amendment will have on the changing of the time in April? As I understand the reading of the bill—I have not examined it before—we have a certain system of time taking effect on the 1st of April. Now, what will be in effect on the 1st of January, 1918, for instance?

Mr. ROBINSON. The only effect will be to postpone the operation of the bill until next year. The reason the amendment was reported by the committee is that in all probability the bill will not become law until some time during the month of July or during the month of August; and it was not therefore thought of sufficient importance to require the changes that the bill contemplates in the advancement of the clock to be made this year.

The bill merely accomplishes two purposes. It enacts into law the existing standard of time, which now has no authority of law except by action of the legislatures in a few States. The present standard of time was adopted by general agreement and at the instance of the railroads in 1883. In addition to making the present measurement of time the legal standard, the act provides that for the period indicated in section 3 of the bill the clock shall be advanced, commencing on the last Sunday in April of each year and ending with the last Sunday in September of that year. Now, since the bill probably can not become a law before some time in July or August, the committee thought it well not to undertake to put it into effect this year.

The only opposition to the bill that has arisen came from certain representatives of the railroads——

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I may save the Senator a whole lot of time. I am just asking for information, not in opposition to the bill at all. If the bill goes into effect on the 1st of January, 1918, will there be any change in our system of time until April 1?

Mr. ROBINSON. None whatever.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is all I wanted to know.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I have been so closely tied up with the Finance Committee that it has been impossible for me to take the Senate Calendar and give it due consideration. Therefore I must admit that I have not even read the bill, and I do not know what its provisions are; but, as I understand, the first change is to take place in April, and instead of calling it 7 o'clock in the morning you will call it 6 o'clock in the morning, but it is the same time of day.

Now, I will ask the Senator how it will operate on the railroads? For instance, they have their printed times of arrival and departure. Does the railroad have to have a new time table every time the change is made, or what are the requirements under the bill in that particular?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I started to state a moment ago that the only objection that has been made to this bill was presented to the committee by a representative of some of the railroads. He suggested that the passage of this bill might occasion some confusion, some inconvenience, and perhaps might be the cause of accidents in some cases, by reason of the failure of the railroads to promptly adjust the operation of their trains to the change in time. As a matter of fact, however, it does not change the hours of labor, which, of course, the Senator from Utah quickly comprehends. It simply provides that at a given time the clock shall be advanced one hour, for the purpose, of course, of obtaining more daylight.

In my judgment—and it was the judgment of the committee, which gave very careful consideration to the matter, and especially to the suggestions that were made by the representatives of the railroads—it will occasion some little inconvenience; but in view of the very large economic value which the bill has, the saving that will result in fuel, lights, and the conservation of time for all classes of laborers throughout the country, that difficulty is more than offset by the advantages of the bill.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. It seems to me that what the Senator from Utah wants to know is whether the railroads will have to reprint their time-tables. Is that it?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; it seems to me that they will have to.

Mr. KELLOGG. No; they do not have to. They simply give an order, in advance of the date, that at a certain time all the railroad clocks shall be moved forward one hour. They do not change their time-tables at all; and that is all there is to it, so far as they are concerned.

Mr. ROBINSON. Of course, in practical operation there is value in the suggestion of the Senator from Utah. In practical operation it does not work out as simply as appears from the statement which the Senator from Minnesota has so clearly made. In practical operation you will find that a train that started out at 8 o'clock on the morning before the change is made is required to change its time one hour while it is on its route; and it will occasion some inconvenience and confusion—there is no escaping that conclusion.

Mr. KELLOGG. But they do not have to reprint all the time-tables.

Mr. ROBINSON. Oh, no; certainly not. I thought my explanation made that clear—that they merely change their clocks, as it is anticipated other people will do, and get to work an hour earlier, and finish work an hour earlier, during the summer months.

I want to say to the Senator from Utah, while this does not bear directly upon the question which he is asking, and which I have answered in the only way that I think it can be answered, that this subject has been under investigation not only in the United States but in foreign countries. Great Britain, Germany, France, Italy, Austria, Holland, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, Portugal, Australia, and Iceland have all adopted substantially the provisions of this bill; and in the British Parliament a very valuable report was made which is made available to the Senate and to the committee through investigations, I think, of the Boston Chamber of Commerce. I am going to ask to print that in the RECORD in connection with my remarks, if there be no objection. It goes into the subject very fully, and explains the very great advantages of the bill. The report states there that in these foreign countries practically no difficulty has occurred in the matter of the operation of the railroads, although the case might be slightly different here on account of the transcontinental lines and the greater length of the railroads in the United States. The only objection that could possibly be urged to the bill is the one which is implied in the question of the Senator from Utah; and as I stated a while ago, that objection is not sufficient to overcome the advantages which patently appear from a consideration of the bill.

The United States Chamber of Commerce also made a very full investigation of this subject and published a report which is very valuable and interesting. It is almost amazing to know the economies that are conserved in foreign countries by the passage of legislation of this sort, and which we hope will be brought about in the United States if this bill becomes a law. I ask that that report may be printed in the RECORD also.

I have had a thousand telegrams and letters concerning this bill. As I was chairman of the subcommittee that considered it the communications were addressed to me. More than a hundred boards of trade and chambers of commerce have investigated the measure and reported favorably upon it. In addition to that nearly all the representatives of such bodies in the United States have strongly indorsed the bill, some of them appearing before the committee. I have received only one letter in opposition to it and at least a thousand in favor of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas asks to have certain data printed in the RECORD in connection with his remarks. Without objection it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

THE DAYLIGHT-SAVING PLAN AS A WAR MEASURE.

I. THE DAYLIGHT-SAVING PLAN WAS ADOPTED AS A WAR MEASURE BY GREAT BRITAIN, GERMANY, FRANCE, ITALY, AUSTRIA, HOLLAND, DENMARK, NORWAY, SWEDEN, PORTUGAL, AUSTRALIA, AND ICELAND.

The year 1916 was the first year of operation of the plan in all but the last two countries, which adopted the plan this year.

A committee of the House of Commons, which made a preliminary study of the question in 1908 and 1909, reported favorably a daylight-saving bill, stating the results would be:

"To promote the greater use of daylight for recreative purposes.

"To lessen the use of houses licensed for the sale of intoxicating liquors.

"To facilitate the training of the territorial force.

"To benefit the physique, general health, and welfare of all classes of the community.

"To reduce the industrial, commercial, and domestic expenditure on artificial light.

"That the object of the bill, which is desirable and would benefit the community, can not be attained without legislation.

"And that an alteration of the clock of one hour in April and a similar alteration of one hour in September is the best mode of attaining the object of the bill."

II. REASONS WHY DAYLIGHT SAVING WAS ADOPTED AS A WAR MEASURE.

A. Economy: In consumption of coal, oil, gas, light, etc.

ENGLAND.

1. The savings in the use of artificial light and fuel to produce this in England were estimated as $2,500,000 for the summer months alone. (Parliamentary Debates, House of Commons, vol. 82, No. 20, p. 304.)

2. Mr. Hanbury Thomas, of the Sheffield United Gas Co., has suggested that a general estimate for the whole country can be arrived at from the figures of actual saving in coal given in the replies from those undertakings who use coal and no other fuel, on the following plan: The amount of coal stated by such undertakings (28 in number) to have been saved as a direct result of summer time, works out in the aggregate at 1.449 per cent of the total annual quantity carbonized by them. The total quantity of coal used by all gas undertakings in the United Kingdom in 1915 was, in round figures, 18,000,000 tons. Reckoning 1.449 per cent of those figures, therefore, the saving in coal affected by gas undertakings in the United Kingdom as a result of the four and one-half months of summer time may be put at about 260,000 tons.

Further, applying the same percentage to the total annual sum spent by consumers on gas (reckoned on the total annual sales of gas undertakings, at 3s. per 1,000 cubic feet) the saving in expenditures to consumers works out at about £475,000.

These estimates can not, of course, be regarded as anything but conjectural; but they represent the best that can be done with the figures, and are not perhaps very far wide of the mark.

(Report summer time committee, England, February, 1917, p. 12.)

3. The parliamentary committee heard from over 80 municipal electrical light undertakings, from 50 to 60 private companies, and from 11 electric power companies.

The estimates of the reduction in consumption of electric light vary very widely—from 1.25 per in cent in one case to 55 per cent.

The returns of the power companies give a mean reduction of 26 per cent for lighting purposes.

Thirty-eight private companies furnished figures giving an estimate of reduction varying from 10 to 41 per cent, the mean for the 38 being 23 per cent.

Sixty-four municipal undertakings give a mean reduction of 18.3 per cent in units used for lighting.

4. According to E. Houghton Fry, secretary committee for regulation of petroleum supplies, the economy affected by the daylight-saving act in consumption of illuminating oils in England was 2¼ per cent of the consumption for the year, i. e., about 11,500 tons.

"This seems to be a very modest proportion, but it should be remembered that 11,500 tons represents two journeys by an oil tanker, which would occupy approximately four months, and this saving, therefore, can by no means be regarded as negligible. In fact, owing to the shortage that is at present being experienced in these vessels the result is a very welcome one."

5. The following data is taken from the report of the Association of the Chambers of Commerce of the United Kingdom on the summer-time act of 1916. These statements are significant in view of the large amount of daylight which England ordinarily has.

All the chambers report that the operation of the act has resulted in a considerable saving in artificial light. The saving has been somewhat reduced by the fact that overtime has been worked in all centers, while the lighting restriction has probably increased it. Notwithstanding these factors the chambers are of the opinion that there has been considerable saving. In a few cases figures have been given, as follows:

Belfast: Resulted in very appreciable saving of artificial light. This has been proved by decreased revenue of municipal lighting authorities. In Belfast the consumption of gas was less by 5¼ per cent than in the same months of 1915, while in electricity there was a saving of 2 per cent.

Blackburn: Decrease in gas consumption in Blackburn 8.19 per cent as compared with similar period in previous years. This is equal to a saving in coal of 1,710 tons. Consumption of electricity decreased by 20 or 25 per cent in the case of large shops.

Edinburgh: Saving in city of Edinburgh considerably exceeded £10,000.

The following savings are given:

(a) Large printing establishment, working all night, 13½ per cent.

(b) Large hotel, 9 per cent.

(c) Another large hotel, 6 per cent.

(d) Consumption of gas reduced by 8 per cent, equal in money to over £6,000.

(e) Electric light used decreased by 3 per cent, though this to some extent may have been due to police regulations.

Manchester: The act did result in a saving of the consumption of gas in Manchester. The decrease between 6 p. m. and 1 a. m. amounted to 134,000,000 cubic feet, equal to 2 per cent on the annual consumption, or equivalent to 11,000 tons of coal. In residential districts the electric light used was decreased by about 15 per cent on a previous year.

Newport: Saving estimated at from 15 to 25 per cent.

Nottingham: The saving is put at 10 to 15 per cent.

Oldham: Returns by corporation showed good reduction in quantity of gas and electricity used.

Portsmouth: The saving is put at 25 per cent.

6. Mr. Herbert Samuel, in the House of Commons, May 8, 1916, said:

"The Government would not have dreamt of favoring this measure or of inviting the House to consider it unless it had reason to think that it was essentially advantageous for war purposes.

"The question of our coal supply is one which is giving us serious concern.

"We are casting about in every direction for means to increase our coal supplies, and when a proposal is made which we believe and, indeed, are convinced would lead to a large economy of certainly many hundreds of thousands of tons of coal in the course of a year we can not regard that as a matter of indifference."

7. The question was first brought to notice by the expert committee appointed to advise the Government on the disposal of the coal output. This central committee for the disposal of coal unanimously passed a resolution urging the Government to adopt the daylight-saving plan in order to conserve the coal resources of the nation.

8. The board of trade found it necessary to urge upon all gas and electric light companies a reduction in their consumption of coal.

9. The railway executive committee managing the railways on behalf of the Government favored the proposal. (Parliamentary Debates, House of Commons, May 8, 1916, p. 345.)

FRANCE.

[From summary, Report of M. Maliavalle (Depute) on behalf "Commission de l'Enseignment et des Beaux Arts" on bill for renewal of summer time in 1917 and subsequent years.]

1. The committee record two sets of estimates of the total saving in coal for the whole country, as follows: The total quantity of coal consumed by gas undertakings in France annually being put at 5,000,000 tons and by electrical undertakings at 2,000,000—7,000,000 tons in all—an economy of 10 per cent on this amount (which the committee think it fair to take as result of summer time) gives about 60,000 tons over one month, 200,000 tons over three and one-half months (length of summer-time period in France in 1916), 360,000 tons over six months, 410,000 tons over seven months.

If a 15 per cent economy is reckoned, the savings are estimated at about 87,500 tons over one month, 306,000 tons over three and one-half months, 525,000 tons over six months, 612,000 tons over seven months.

Reckoning a mean between these two calculations, the saving over six months is put at 442,500 tons, and over seven months at 511,000 tons, representing a saving in cost (estimating £1,750,000) and 51,000,000 (£2,030,000), respectively; "chiffres moyens qui pourraient approcher davantage de la verite."

2. The director of inventions affecting the national defense, after studying figures of output of gas during the periods preceding and following the introduction of summer time and the restoration of normal time, concluded that the saving in coal or gaslight might be put at 1 kilogram (somewhat over 2 pounds) per person, or 1 ton for each 1,000 persons per month.

There are said to be 18,000,000 persons in France "eclaires par le gaz," so that the economy of coal on this basis would amount to 18,000 tons per month, or more than 200,000 over the whole year.

The figure for electricity undertakings is estimated as 100,000, giving a total of 300,000 tons (30,000,000 francs, or £1,190,000) for gas and electricity combined. Half this amount would be saved for the summer-time period.

3. At the Calais Docks there was an increase in unloading capacity of 250 tons each day of summer.

4. At Marseille it was found possible to deal with an extra quantity of goods estimated at between 12,000 and 31,000 tons from July to September (2¼ per cent to 4 per cent of the total tonnage unloaded).

GERMANY.

The municipal gas works at Berlin reported a decrease during May and June (1916) of 508,500 cubic meters, in spite of the fact that 18,000 new gas meters were put up during the first six months of 1916, and the records from January to April showed an increase of 2.4 million cubic meters' output of gas as compared with 1915.

The other countries of Europe are investigating the results of last year's operation of the daylight-saving plan. (Report English Commission, p. 17.)

III. DAYLIGHT SAVING AS A WAR MEASURE IN THE UNITED STATES.

A. The food problem:

1. This country is facing a very serious food problem, the solution of which, in part at least, lies in increased, intensive cultivation of the soil. All agricultural operations must cease at sunset.

2. The daylight-saving plan offers opportunity to over 20,000,000 workers engaged in trade, transportation, and other pursuits outside the field of agriculture for an extra hour of daylight after their workday is over for work on the land.

Prof. T. N. Carver, Harvard University, and former chief of the Rural Organization Service of the United States Government, says:

"It would be a great help to the movement for the increase of the production of food if working men had an extra hour of daylight in the evening for work in their gardens. An hour's work a day in a garden, if wisely directed, will produce an amazing amount of food.

"I believe this to be of the utmost importance. Unless something unforeseen happens, the world is going to experience the greatest food shortage within the next year that it has known since the Napoleonic wars. The chances are that there will be many hungry people in our large cities before another winter is over, not because there is not enough work for them to do, not because money wages will not be high, but because food will be hard to get at any price. Anything which will enable working men to produce a part of their own food is, therefore, of the utmost importance."

3. The National Emergency Food Garden Commission is inspiring and aiding the planting of 1,000,000 food gardens in cities, towns, and villages. The product of these gardens will supply food valued at $250,000,000. (See American Forestry, April, 1917.) Daylight saving will give tremendous impetus to this movement through the additional daylight hour it offers workers and others.

B. Conservation of coal and other material resources:

1. There is no doubt but what this country will achieve the savings that the European nations have experienced.

(a) Robert L. Brunet, of the Rhode Island Committee on Public Safety, estimated that Providence will save $60,000 yearly in lighting and fuel, and the country would save $40,000,000 annually.

(b) The special committee of the Boston Chamber of Commerce estimates that the country would save $100,000,000 annually in the use of artificial light (on basis of plan for operation entire year).

(c) Cleveland saved $200,000 during the first six months' operation of the plan.

C. Increased efficiency of workers:

1. In the summer a cool hour of the morning will be substituted for a warm one of the afternoon. The strength of the workers will thereby be better conserved.

2. There will be less danger from accident.

(a) Artificial light will not be necessary at the end of the workday.

(b) It is a well-known fact that industrial accidents occur most frequently in the late afternoon, the time when fatigue is great and efficiency low. An hour of this period will be shifted to the morning period.

The executive council of the American Federation of Labor recently passed the following resolution:

"Resolved by the executive council of the American Federation of Labor, That we urge the inauguration of a 'daylight-saving' project for the conservation of time and opportunity for great leisure and open-air exercise for the masses of the people, and we insist that in order that the change may be beneficial it must have its general application throughout the United States. We will gratefully receive from and actively give to any groups the fullest support in the attainment of the 'daylight-saving' project so long as it shall be utilized for the purpose herein declared.

"It is the sincere hope that the movement to inaugurate the 'daylight saving' may be entirely successful, and it will be our pleasure to contribute whatever may be in our power to that end."

D. Health, morals, and social welfare:

Workers will be able to spend more time outdoors after the workday is over owing to the additional hour of daylight.

(a) More work in gardens.

(b) Better use of recreational facilities.

(c) Lessened eyestrain for workers due to use of artificial light.

(d) Increase in health of workers and their families.

(e) The "rush" hour will come during daylight and lessen the risk of accident.

W. T. Sedgwick, professor of public health, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, and member of advisory board, Hygienic Laboratory, United States Public Health Service, says:

"I am strongly in favor of the daylight-saving movement both for reasons of thrift and economy and because of its importance for the public health.

By increasing the period of sleep in darkness, it would tend to promote rest and diminish fatigue—since that sleep is best which falls in darkness and quietness. And by increasing by an hour a day the daylight time available for play and pleasure it would tend to promote outdoor life and exercise—both greatly needed in our increasingly sedentary modern life."

NOTE.—The adoption of the daylight-saving plan is being urged as a war measure by the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, representing over 800 trade and commercial bodies. Many other associations are urging immediate action.

The advisory commission to the National Council of Defense passed a resolution indorsing the plan. Action on the plan as a war measure is urged by Massachusetts committee on public safety, Maine committee on public safety, Vermont committee on public safety, New Hampshire committee on public safety, Rhode Island committee on public safety, and Connecticut committee on public safety.

Many cities, towns, organizations, and individuals throughout the country are urging immediate action.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON DAYLIGHT SAVING OF THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

To the Board of Directors of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States:

The daylight hours can be "saved"—i. e., utilized to the best advantage—only by readjusting the hours of work and recreation to which most of the community have become accustomed and by making the readjustment in such a way that these hours will contain a maximum of sunlight. There is no suggestion that the hours of work be either lengthened or shortened.

The hours of our daily life have become somewhat out of keeping with the hours of daylight and we have sacrificed the sunlight which might be utilized for recreation and other leisure activities at the end of the workday. In ancient times, and even within rather recent times, the workday generally began much earlier than at present, and the evening meal usually came at an hour of daylight throughout the year. Development of improved illuminants probably had its part in changing our habits; at present we sleep through many hours of daylight in the morning, begin our conscious day late according to sun time, and during a good part of the year have our evening meal and our period of recreation and leisure after night fall. In effect we throw away daylight and substitute for it artificial heat and light which are but inferior derivatives of the sunlight we thoughtlessly discard.

The amount of daylight which we do not now utilize can not be precisely stated; because the hours of daylight not only vary with the seasons but they differ by as much as an hour in the same day in the northern part of the country and the southern, and they lengthen as altitude above the sea level increases. Whatever the part of the country, however, the morning work period begins so late that the work period which follows luncheon can not have as much sunlight as occurs before noon, and in many cases ends in darkness during an important part of the year.

The manner in which we now utilize these hours of daylight may be illustrated by the situation in Chicago. Throughout the year at Chicago the time between sunrise and noon—when the workday is most commonly broken—is longer than between 1 p. m.—when the second work period ordinarily begins—and sunset. In December there are almost five hours of sunlight before noon and less than three and a half hours after 1 p. m. In June there are approximately eight hours before noon and about six and a half after 1 p. m.

The significance of these facts appears when we recall that, in midsummer, if the workday begins at 8 a. m. and ends at 5 p. m., almost five hours of sunlight have passed before the workday begins and but two and a half remain after its close. Thus, four hours of sunlight are used in the morning for sleep and for the "transition from bed to street." The period at the end of the day, with its great value for development of human efficiency, encouragement of human intercourse, and improvement of social relations, falls partly under artificial light even in the most favorable season of the year, and at other seasons comes altogether after nightfall. If the workday ends at 6, the results are still more undesirable, as subsequent hours of daylight are shortened, and moreover, in a portion of the year the end of the workday, when workers in all occupations are most weary and most need favorable conditions, is reached under artificial light.

Our workday has not only taken such a position that it deprives us of sunlight in a part of the day which has great importance for human efficiency, but it also interferes in our business relations with Europe, the part of the world with which we have our closest relations. Our present arrangement of time, based since 1883 upon "standard" time, with an hour of difference for each zone of 15° of longitude, assigns zones and hours to the barren expanse of the Atlantic Ocean, where they are of no practical utility.

Undoubtedly the result is to keep the clocks in each zone in the United States at least within half an hour of the time which a sundial would show, but the result likewise is that business offices in the eastern part of the United States open at a time when it is 2 o'clock in the business day of London banks and exchanges. When it is 9 o'clock in the morning at New York and Philadelphia it is within six minutes of 3 o'clock in Berlin and 4 o'clock in Petrograd. In Chicago the difference in time with these European centers is one hour greater.

As European countries generally moved the clock forward an hour during the past summer, and will probably do likewise next summer, the difference between the business day in Europe and in the United States will be further accentuated unless action is taken in the United States. It would seem an anachronism that, although we have devised means for instantaneous communication with Europe, we should continue to have our business day so much later than the European business day as to impede our financial and commercial transactions, especially at a time when our relations with Europe have taken on greatly enlarged importance.

With these circumstances in mind, the committee recommends that clocks in the United States should be set one hour ahead of the present "standard" time.

The considerations supporting this proposal are physiological, economic, and social. It will substitute a cool morning working hour in summer for a warm afternoon hour; in winter it may place breakfast before sunrise, but it will bring a greater amount of daylight into the working hours at the end of the day. The accompanying improvements in working conditions will be great. Increased daylight in the hours of greatest fatigue will tend to lessen tuberculosis, will decidedly reduce eye strain, will increase personal efficiency, and will materially lessen industrial accidents. In cities the advantage of having the evening "rush" hour, when transportation facilities are taxed, come in daylight is so apparent it scarcely needs statement.

Hours of sunlight after the end of the workday will confer even greater benefits. Responding to a public demand, which has practically become a national policy, facilities for healthful outdoor recreation have on every hand been multiplied for all classes. In 1915 American cities spent $21,000,000 to maintain their activities in promoting recreation. For this purpose New York used 70 cents per capita of its population, Chicago $1.20, and Boston $1.84. Although perhaps not yet keeping pace with Europe, our cities have invested large sums in land for parks. The significance of the purpose of such investments may be indicated by estimates which declare that in less than 20 years Central Park in New York City added $182,000,000 to the value of land in its vicinity. Counties and other local districts, as in Massachusetts and New Jersey, have undertaken to provide attractive places for outdoor recreation.

A number of States have done likewise, and finally the Federal Government, selecting tracts of most uncommon scenic beauty, dedicated more than 7,000 square miles to public recreation. An additional hour of daylight will not enable any one individual to make use of all these facilities for his healthful pleasure, but it will give him increased opportunity for greater use of those nearest at hand. The use of facilities for recreation, especially by the classes that work longest hours and most need them, would be tremendously increased, with results in health and physical stamina which would redound to the advantage of the whole community. There would be great benefits, too, from the increased opportunities for use of means of education, direct and indirect, which in recent years have been greatly augmented for the period after the workday has closed.

The social life of the Nation, too, would benefit. The hours for companionship among members of families would have greater value, and there would be more opportunity for cultivation of all the useful and desirable activities and interests which engage our attention outside our vocations.

From such benefits as these economic advantages inevitably flow. Improved physical health and social welfare will increase the efficiency of every individual at his daily tasks. Furthermore, there would be large direct savings in expenditures for fuel and artificial light.

In the advantages which have been outlined even those persons who are employed in industries operating 24 hours a day will participate. A shift going to work at 8 o'clock in the morning will have an added daylight hour after work, the shift going on at 4 in the afternoon will have an additional hour of light in which to work, and although the shift beginning work at midnight will lose an hour of daylight it will gain with the other shifts because of the system of rotation in shifts commonly used.

The advantages extend to all parts of the community. Farmers will have an opportunity to market their produce earlier, thus offering it in better condition and gaining an hour of daylight for other work. Transportation companies will move a larger part of their traffic in daylight, thus increasing efficiency and minimizing danger of accidents. Shopkeepers and their employees will avoid an hour of darkness. Office people will work under less artificial light.

To the proposal there are no serious scientific objections, according to the testimony of eminent astronomers. English astronomers have said that meridians of longitude are made for man and not man for meridians, and that the clock is a mere symbol representing intervals of time according to standards which are largely arbitrary. American astronomers who have been consulted have the same point of view.

Of the practical results of the proposal there has been during the last summer demonstration in Europe, where it was adopted during the summer months by Austria, Denmark, England, France, Germany, Italy, Holland, Norway, Portugal, and Sweden. In some of these countries official inquiries are understood to be now in progress for the purpose of ascertaining the concrete results. Unofficial statements seem to leave no doubt, however, that the same plan will be put into effect next summer, and that efficiency was increased in all parts of the population and important savings in fuel and illuminants were accomplished at a time when the belligerent countries were conserving their resources to the utmost extent possible.

There has been successful experience in the United States, too. Cleveland and Detroit in 1914 set their clocks an hour forward. Officials and commercial organizations in these cities testify that the change was made without the least difficulty and has met with universal favor. The action of these cities, independently of other communities in their vicinity, has probably owed a part of its success to the fact that they lie in the eastern part of the zone of central standard time and consequently near the zone of eastern time, which they adopted.

The committee has stated its preference that clocks should be advanced one hour and permanently kept ahead by that interval. If such plan should not prove feasible, the committee recommends that clocks should be advanced one hour on April 1 each year and turned back on November 30.

The greatest amount of daylight now unutilized in our active hours comes between the equinox in March and the equinox in September. Accordingly, the proposal would confer its greatest advantages between these dates. In the United States, with its large centers of railroad transportation and hundreds of trains in motion at all times, two changes of time a year, even if made at moments of minimum railway traffic, such as midnight on a Sunday, might cause some inconvenience. Traffic is to a degree seasonal, however, and schedules are frequently changed about April 1 and November 30, ordinarily on a Sunday. Accordingly, if the advantages of the proposal do not appear material enough during winter months to warrant an all-year change, and "summertime" alone is to be adopted, as in European countries, the two changes of the clock should come at the seasons when our railways now generally readjust their schedules.

Whatever the plan adopted, i. e., whether the clock is advanced once for all or is changed twice each year, the change should occur simultaneously in all parts of the country. Otherwise, confusion will arise and we shall return to the unfortunate state of affairs which existed before "standard" time was generally adopted, in 1883, upon the initiative of the railways. Standard time, it will be recalled, rests upon concerted action upon the part of the railways and not upon any enactment of Congress; several States subsequently adopted it as a matter of law, but Congress has never done so.

Wherever the plan has been tried merely in a local way, and without especially favorable circumstances, there have been difficulties and in some cases abandonment has been forced without a fair trial. For example, when Manchester, N. H., tried the plan without cooperation from the rest of New England it had to give it up because of resulting confusion. Similarly, Hamilton, Ontario, undertaking to act without concurrence from Toronto, failed to obtain the inherent benefits. Other cities in Canada including Halifax, London, Brantford, and Calgary, have found corresponding obstacles to local action.

Uniformity should be obtained, the committee recommends, through an act of Congress establishing the time for each part of the country as one hour in advance of the present standard time.

That Congress has authority under the Constitution to enact such a law the committee feels assured. The committee has had the benefit of the views of very able lawyers, who have asserted that the commerce clause and the clause regarding establishment of post offices and post roads confer ample power.

The desirability that Congress should exercise its power is manifested by the national advantages which will accrue in ways outlined in this report and by the necessity of a uniform system of time throughout all parts of the country. Unless clocks in Seattle, Denver, St. Louis, and all other communities are moved forward one hour when clocks at New York and Boston are advanced one hour, inevitable confusion would result, to the detriment of many of our most important business interests.

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

In 1908 a committee of the House of Commons reported favorably a bill for moving the clock one hour ahead between the third Sunday in April and the third Sunday in September, stating the results would be:

"To promote the greater use of daylight for recreative purposes.

"To lessen the use of houses licensed for the sale of intoxicating liquors.

"To facilitate the training of the territorial force.

"To benefit the physique, general health, and welfare of all classes of the community.

"To reduce the industrial, commercial, and domestic expenditure on artificial light.

"That the object of the bill, which is desirable and would benefit the community, can not be attained without legislation.

"And that an alteration of the clock of one hour in April and a similar alteration of one hour in September is the best mode of attaining the object of the bill."

APPENDIX B.

STANDARD TIME AND STANDARD-TIME SECTIONS.

STATEMENT BY THE UNITED STATES BUREAU OF STANDARDS.

The use of standard time in sections differing by integral hour differences of longitude from Greenwich instead of local mean time has now become nearly universal throughout the civilized world. Practically all the nations of Europe have abandoned their local meridian time in favor of this important change to the use of a common meridian of reference. * * * As an introduction to the table of the boundary points of the different time sections in the United States, it may be well to explain briefly what the difference is between standard time and mean local time and how the country is divided up into different time sections.

The mean local time of any place is the time in mean solar days reckoned from the mean time of the sun's passage across the meridian through that place as the point of reference for the time. The mean solar day is the average throughout the year of the time between two successful passages of the sun across any given meridian of the earth. The actual time of transit of the sun across the meridian varies from mean noon throughout the year, due to the elliptical shape of the earth's orbit, the total variation being about 32 minutes. Therefore, in order that the days measured by the sun's transits may not be of varying duration the instant of transit of a "mean sun" or imaginary sun is taken as the zero, and the intervals between such assumed transits of a "mean sun" are designated as mean solar days.

Standard time is mean solar time, so far as its duration or unit of measurement is concerned; the difference between it and mean local time lies in the point of reference from which it is measured. In order to avoid the troubles arising from each place using its own local time, reckoned from the transit of the "mean sun" across the local meridian, the country is divided into standard time sections of approximately 15 degrees of longitude in width, and each place in the time section uses, instead of its own local time, the time counted from the transit of the "mean sun" across the seventy-fifth meridian west of Greenwich, or of the nineties, one hundred and fifth, or one hundred and twentieth meridian, depending upon the time section in which the place is located. * * *

The question of changing from the time of one time section to that of another arises in practice almost exclusively in the operation of railroads, however, and because of the inconvenience of changing the time by the necessary amount of one hour at every point where a railroad crosses one of these boundary meridians the more convenient practice has been followed of making the change usually at some terminal or division point on the road, or at some junction point, or at the boundary line between the United States and Canada. The result is that practically the boundaries of the time sections are defined by the lines connecting these railroad points of time change and because of the location of these railroad junctions or terminals the resulting lines are quite irregular. * * *

As stated before the difference of standard time between two adjacent time sections is just one hour, inasmuch as the equivalent of the difference of 15 degrees of longitude between the reference meridians amounts to one hour in time. Hence, when it is noon at any point in the eastern-time section, it is 11 a. m. at all places in the central-time section, 10 a. m. in the mountain-time section, and 9 a. m. in the Pacific-time section. In traveling westward, therefore, from one time section to another, one must set his watch back one hour, while in traveling eastward the watch should be set ahead one hour whenever he passes from one time section to another.

ENGLAND'S DAYLIGHT-SAVING LAW.

SUMMER-TIME ACT, 1916.

[6 & 7 Geo. 5, Cap. 14.]

An act to provide for the time in Great Britain and Ireland being in advance of Greenwich and Dublin mean time, respectively, in summer months.—(17 May, 1916).

Be it enacted by the King's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows.

1. Time in summer months: (1) During the prescribed period in each year in which this act is in force the time for general purposes in Great Britain shall be one hour in advance of Greenwich mean time.

(2) This act shall be in force in the year 1916, and in that year the prescribed period shall be from 2 o'clock in the morning Greenwich mean time on Sunday, the 21st day of May, until 2 o'clock in the morning Greenwich mean time on Sunday, the 1st day of October, and His Majesty may in any subsequent year, by order in council made during the continuance of the present war, declare this act to be in force during that year, and in such case the prescribed period in that year shall be such as may be fixed by order in council.

(3) Wherever any expression of time occurs in any act of Parliament, order in council, order regulation, rule for by-law, or in any deed, time-table notice, advertisement, or other document the time mentioned or referred to shall be held during the prescribed period to be the time as fixed by this act:

Provided, That where in consequence of this act it is expedient that any time fixed by any by-law, regulation, or other instrument should be adjusted and such adjustment can not be effected except after the lapse of a certain interval or on compliance with certain conditions, the appropriate Government department may, on the application of the body or person by whom the by-law, regulation, or other document was administered, make such adjustment in the time so fixed as in the circumstances may seem to the department proper, and if any question arises as to what Government department is the appropriate Government department the question shall be finally determined by the Treasury.

(4) This act shall apply to Ireland in like manner as it applies to Great Britain, with the substitution, however, of references to Dublin mean time for references to Greenwich mean time.

(5) Nothing in this act shall affect the use of Greenwich mean time for purposes of astronomy, meteorology, or navigation, or affect the construction of any document mentioning or referring to time in connection with such purposes as aforesaid.

2. Short title: This act shall be cited as the summer-time act, 1916.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, some 10 years ago a constituent of mine became very deeply interested in this subject. I suppose the organization to which he belonged prepared a bill at that time, and I remember introducing it by request into the Senate.

CONSERVATION OF FOOD AND FUEL.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah will suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The bill (S. 2463) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not see the Senator from Oregon, who has charge of the bill, present, and I ask if the Senator who is——

Mr. UNDERWOOD rose.

Mr. ROBINSON. I will ask the Senator from Alabama if he will agree that it be laid temporarily aside.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will state to the Senator from Arkansas that the Senator from Oregon asked me to represent him, as he was necessarily out of the Chamber in the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry considering the House food bill. He stated that if there was no one who wished to discuss the pending bill he would desire to have the Senate take a recess until half past 3, and by that time he expected the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry would report the House bill. So I take it from that statement there will be no objection on his part to laying aside the bill temporarily for the further consideration of the bill which the Senator from Arkansas has in charge.

Mr. CURTIS. Before the bill is laid aside I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD an argument in favor of the amendment I offered on last Monday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement referred to is as follows:

ARGUMENT MADE IN FAVOR OF THE CURTIS AMENDMENT TO THE LEVER FOOD BILL BY MRS. HAVILAND H. LUND, SECRETARY NATIONAL FORWARD-TO-THE-LAND LEAGUE, NEW YORK.

The Lever bill provides for increasing food production. Inasmuch as consumption has been outstripping production for several years, it is manifestly impossible to meet the combined demands of our own people and the allies unless we put vacant farm lands into cultivation. Other countries have, through their Governments, furnished the land and equipment on long, easy terms of credit—this with no reference to the war. Private enterprise has developed colonization along similar lines in the same countries. On June 12 Senator SHEPPARD, of Texas, gave detailed information as to what has been done in colonization by other countries. It can be found in the RECORD, on page 3784. I can add nothing to his very comprehensive statement. The success of the war depends primarily upon food. The production of sufficient foodstuffs depends upon the development, cultivation, and proper settlement of the now unproductive areas. Our maximum production is insufficient. We must take people from the cities who are willing to farm and place them on the vacant land. Since our Government is responsible for the care of certain of these people, namely, the dependent families of our soldiers, and must provide for them, why should not the two national problems be so related that the solution of one becomes the solution of the other?

Many thousands of immigrants have during the years of the war left this country for military service in Europe. These families of our allies, to the number of many thousands, are in our midst, and probably 90 per cent of the wives of these absent soldiers understand agriculture. Not only have women proved themselves good agriculturists in Europe since the war made it necessary for them to farm, but the Women's Agricultural Society can furnish thousands of instances of successful women farmers in the United States. Then, too, there are growing children in these families, and there is much about farm work which children can do without injury to themselves. If these families remain in the city, even on a generous pension, the mothers and older children must go out to work and the family is usually broken up. The children leave school too early, and we rob the Nation of the best that is in these children if we do not give them the proper education. Farm work holds the family together.

France and England are caring for their disabled soldiers by placing them in farm colonies organized along the lines that the National Forward-to-the-Land League has been urging for several years. We must face the fact that future drafts of soldiers may call out those who have families. Are they going to enlist cheerfully with food shortage staring their loved ones in the face? People in the cities are terrified at this thought of food shortage, and would undoubtedly organize with enthusiasm to go out in groups into such farm colonies as we propose. It is to be expected that some of these people will be found unfitted for farm life, but these can later be returned to the city.

Our league conducted a bureau of information on the east side of New York City for nearly a year. We had night classes in gardening and household economics, taught by the extension department of the State Agricultural College. Our signed application cards show that there are thousands of people of all nationalities who want farms. Seventy-five per cent of this registration had had farm experience here or abroad, but less than 1 per cent were willing to go to isolated farms and cope with the problems presented by such locations. The people are keen to go out in groups and build up rural villages such as exist abroad. They want the standard of rural community recommended by our league. They insist that their children have proper school facilities and that the school be utilized as a social center. Money or land alone will not solve the problem. What the people themselves demand in the way of living conditions must be the ultimate criterion. The war has taught us the necessity for local self-sufficiency. Our country made its greatest progress during the time when the small village, with its surrounding farm settlements, was in full flower. Lack of communication ultimately broke up those self-sustaining farm communities and the drift to the city began. To-day we have the means of communication and transportation, lack of which was the primary cause of our city congestion. Since love of home is the strongest passion in the human heart, it should be used as the motive power to place families on farms and cause them to work with patriotic fervor. It has been aptly said that "no man ever shouldered a musket for a boarding house," and we add "or for an overcrowded tenement."

During this season groups of people can be housed in tents, and as permanent quarters are constructed the canvas can be used for opening new camps. Individual ownership of the land should obtain from the first, though the entire tract must be treated as a business unit and the farming conducted as it is on large individual farms or plantations. Each group should be supplied with canning outfits in order to conserve the surplus.

No program for national defense is practical unless it includes the settlement of our vacant agricultural land and the organization of agriculture on business principles. Our first concern in such a program is to put the landowner and the land broker in their places. Our present methods of colonization and sale of agricultural land are largely the cause of the slow repopulation of agricultural districts. We have recognized that the profit on public utilities must be regulated. It is time we recognized the fact that the foundation fact of increased food production lies in the proper pricing and terms of sale on agricultural land.

1. There must be a systematized and scientific appraisal service, recognized as authoritative and operative throughout the entire United States.

2. A recognized standard for the organization and equipment of rural colonies.

3. There must be an educational and informative center in all of our large cities, operating without profit, where the people can secure land and agricultural information. Such a center would be able to take a census of the city people who are fitted for farm life. The Government, State and Federal, has at great expense accumulated a large volume of agricultural information. This is to a large extent bottled up. The great mass of people do not know of its existence or how to avail themselves of it. Only a private organization free from the publicity restrictions that hamper Government bureaus can publish this information and get it out of cold storage.

Plans for colonization are set forth by the Nation Forward-to-the-Land League in the RECORD of January 21, 1916, in my hearing before the House Immigration Committee on House bill 558. My recommendation regarding the literacy test would immediately increase production. I said, in part: "Our chief interest, of course, in this literacy test is to know the capacity of the person for culture and education, and we know that sometimes—indeed, many times—those from the other side have not had the educational opportunities, yet have made good citizens. I represent the National Forward-to-the-Land League, a federation of many organizations interested in the distribution of all of our people; there is no discrimination made for or against the immigrant, but this matter of distribution of the immigrant is certainly a very important one, and my suggestion to this committee is this: Since we have millions of acres of vacant land, that there be a receiving station established in connection with the State agricultural colleges where the immigrants that pass the moral and physical tests, with which we are familiar, can have a three-months' probationary period, where, under the direction of agricultural instructors, they are tested as to their fitness and ability to go upon the land. During that three months' time they should have classes in English and in the laws pertaining to citizenship, and general instruction as to procedure here, so that their fitness for citizenship may be determined. Their capacity to receive an education would also be determined by such a probationary period. This entails no ultimate expense to the State, because the labor of these people during that interim on the experimental farm would more than compensate for their maintenance."

It is amazing how tenaciously we cling to the idea of settling our farm lands in the same old way. This in face of the fact that rural life as it now exists in the United States does not keep its boys and girls on the farm.

The National Forward-to-the-Land League has a thoroughly digested colonization plan. It proposes to begin upon the first natural points of attack in developing these plans, and then to permit the gradual unfolding of said plans as necessity demands. Its first office is to direct groups of people desiring to locate together or individuals to any properly accredited piece of land suitable in all particulars for their colonization. It will secure for the holding syndicate or corporation owning such land scientific agricultural directors, social organizers, and religious leaders.

There is an appeal to the self-interest of business men in our plan. By incorporating a colonization company and voluntarily limiting their profits they are feeding "the goose that lays the golden egg" instead of killing it, as the land methods of the past have done. Every man in this corporation is continuously enriched in his other business enterprises by helping to create a prosperous and therefore purchasing rural community through this colonization organization.

Individuals and communities are often willing to extend credit to the right kind of settler. How shall they know the right kind? By dealing with a selected and organized group from our bureau of information there is a known basis of credit.

To colonies organized by the National Forward-to-the-Land League Dr. P. P. Claxton, Commissioner of Education at Washington, sends a man from that department to organize the school. Mr. A. E. Roberts, of the international Young Men's Christian Association, sends a rural Young Men's Christian Association secretary. Dr. L. S. Cofer, of Foreign and Insular Quarantine and Immigration, United States Public Health and Marine Hospital Service, sends an engineer from that department for the sanitary survey. Dr. Myron T. Scudder, of the University of Virginia, and principal of the Scudder School, recognized authority on rural recreation, will make the survey for recreation grounds. Dr. Thomas N. Carver, director of rural organization for the National Forward-to-the-Land League and professor of rural economics at Harvard University, will personally organize these colony groups.

In our own country the Mormons, Catholics, Quakers, and Doukobors have colonized successfully. The Jewish Agricultural Society has placed Jewish farmers in every State of our Union. The Baron de Hirsch fund has approximately a half million dollars, and under the wise management of Mr. Leonard G. Robinson has during the past 10 years loaned this out in second and third mortgages, sometimes lending as high as 90 per cent of the value of the farm, and the loss has been negligible. Those who say our plan is too Utopian to succeed have only to examine the reports of the Jewish Agricultural Society and of the Mormons to find out their mistake. The Mormons are the only people who went about colonization in a businesslike way and secured enough capital to adequately finance beginners through the initial years. The church, the school, and the community house for their recreation are always provided. They took the poorest people and proved that they could learn to farm successfully under proper supervision when the tools were furnished. Father De Vos, of the Catholic Colonization Society, after seven years' experience, said that they could put hundreds of thousands of their people on farms if he could secure money enough to finance them as to equipment, schools, and recreation halls. That he had not been able to secure the capital necessary and that they were not able individually in most cases to do more than purchase their land and insufficient equipment. They have placed many successful farmers, but Father De Vos says that colonization in their church will not be successful until capital is provided to build rural villages according to the standard outlined by the National Forward-to-the-Land League. I will say here that all of the officers of the Catholic Colonization Society are members of the executive board of the league, as are the officers of the Salvation Army and certain other Protestant religious organizations, as well as officers in the National Grange and farmers' unions.

The standard recommended by the National Forward-to-the-Land League in rural communities is as follows:

1. At least 50 farms fully equipped as to houses, barns, fences, wells, etc. Minimum of at least 5 acres per farm cleared. Agricultural implements, horse or mule, one cow, one dozen chickens, and two pigs on each farm.

2. Agricultural instructor and market expert.

3. Applicants move to these farms as an organized unit under contract to follow the instructions of the agricultural director until their debt is paid. It is thus possible to treat these 50 separate holdings as a business unit and buy and sell in carload lots. Loneliness and waste are eliminated.

These farms should be sold on at least 20 years' time, at a low rate of interest. There should be no payment exacted until the second or third year, though the privilege should be given to cancel the obligation at any interest anniversary. A deed to the property should be delivered when possession is taken, the colonists executing a trust deed as security for the debt. This transaction has a psychological value. The feeling of home ownership is immediately engendered and this feeling can not be overestimated. The organization of the colony proper will be according to the bulletin on Rural Organization, which can be had from the Department of Agriculture. This bulletin was written by Dr. Thomas Nixon Carver, who, under the Taft administration, organized the Division of Markets and Rural Organization in the Department of Agriculture, and who is director of rural organization in our league.

For several years the National Forward-to-the-Land League has been trying to rouse the people to the necessity of coordinating the religious and welfare associations and maintaining for them a bureau of land information that should act as a clearing house for all who wish to engage in farming. Through this clearing house all could cooperate with the commercial organizations in the several States wanting farm settlers, and so bring together the men, the land, and the money. We devised a business organization for colonies, which furnishes from 75 to 90 per cent of credit to the farmer. This credit includes both land and its equipment, and builds the colony group according to the standard outlined above.

Had the coordination of organizations, governmental and private, proposed by the league through its bureau of information been used by them—had they worked with us to help introduce classes in gardening and home economics into the public-school systems, both in day and night classes, four years ago when we first proposed it, the agricultural situation would have been vastly different to-day. However, instead of centralizing this work and cooperating through the bureau, several of the organizations started classes similar to those we were conducting with the assistance of the agricultural extension service and endeavored to center this class work in their own private organizations, some of the supposedly patriotic and welfare societies even making a charge for these classes. The rivalry thus developed naturally nullified the work of all. Another important sacrifice entailed by this attempt of several organizations to do the work individually is to be seen this year in the home-garden situation. Suddenly everyone wanted to espouse the cause of the home garden, agricultural inertia gave way to agricultural hysteria. The result to-day is a chaotic overproduction of certain garden produce, glutting the market and injuring the business of the regular truck farmer. Had this work been properly organized there would have been no such disturbance, because the planting would have been done so as to increase the food production in a systematic manner.

Unless there is cooperation between the agricultural efforts of city and country—unless there is some authorized plan for production and distribution, we can expect no practical result from our work. I am glad we are at last going to confer such power upon some one able to bring order out of this agricultural chaos. We are fortunate in having a man for the place of Mr. Hoover's known ability.

H. G Wells said in an article on "Reconstruction after the war" that unless Great Britain and the United States stopped the waste occasioned by duplication of work, both in the Government and through private organizations—unless the petty jealousies, the greed for power, prestige, or profit arising directly or indirectly from multiplication of organizations can be eliminated and cooperation take the place of this rampant individualism, there will be no reconstruction.

The housewives' waste and the middle man's waste is as nothing compared with the waste from these sources. I believe up to the time I read yesterday morning's paper there have been announced some five or six clearing houses for war effort in Washington and New York alone.

The coordination of the several interests as planned by us is shown in the following epitome:

EPITOME OF THE WORK FOR THE NATIONAL FORWARD-TO-THE-LAND LEAGUE.

Bureau service free to the public. The league is incorporated as a nonprofit-making association, and does not buy or sell land, but cooperates with commercial organizations and land companies in any State, providing the standard recommended by the league for rural organization and valuation is installed.

BUREAU OF INFORMATION.

Millions of dollars are spent annually by home-hungry people buying land on the installment plan.

This money is almost invariably lost, and worse than the loss of the money is the discouragement and bitterness engendered in the hearts of those who lose. It is easy to direct this purchasing power.

(A) Night classes in agriculture and household economics conducted by the extension department of the State College of Agriculture, and ultimately in the city public schools.

(B) Circulate application cards through the public schools, churches, welfare organizations, and Government bureaus. From the census thus secured groups of prospective buyers are organized. Individual investigation of each applicant. Colonization committees (below referred to) can safely extend credit to such groups for fully equipped farms.

(C) Publicity bureaus.
(D) Inspection of soil content, titles, contracts, mortgage notes, etc. The league's soil inspection is conducted by men recommended by the Bureau of Soil Survey in Washington. Legal inspection by the league's attorney.

Governors of all the States have been invited to assemble an exhibit of the agricultural and industrial resources of their respective States. These exhibits to be free to the public. The physical exhibit to be supplemented by lectures and motion pictures.

PERMANENT LAND EXHIBIT.

The motion-picture auditorium and committee rooms to be placed at the disposal of certain clubs and welfare organizations free of rent, in order to bring these groups of city leaders where they will unconsciously be educated in matters pertaining to agricultural life.

The bureau of information and reference library to be located at the entrance of this permanent land exhibit. Its lectures, classes, and other activities will invite attendance to the permanent land exhibit and give publicity to the same.

COLONIZATION.

Commercial organizations in every State having vacant agricultural land recognize the menace of land misrepresentation. Boards of trade and chambers of commerce will appoint colonization committees to cooperate with the league's bureaus of information.

(A) Inspection and listing of county lands suitable for colonization.

ACTIVITIES OF BOARD OF TRADE COLONIZATION COMMITTEE.

(B) Incorporating and financing colonization projects that the credit burden may not fall solely upon the landlord, bank, or railroad, but be distributed among all the business men, since all profit alike by the upbuilding of the back country. A practical process of underwriting good citizenship.

(C) Inspection of farm lands so colonized to enforce the soil conservation clause in the mortgage.

(D) Local publicity for these projects.

LOGICAL SOURCES OF REVENUE.

A flat rate should be paid annually by boards of trade, chambers of commerce, railroads, steamship lines, bankers' associations, permanent land exhibits, etc., for the conduct of bureaus of information in all the principal cities and in Europe.

It is both unnecessary and undesirable that our Government should attempt to furnish credit and build colonies for farmers with small capital, or indeed without any capital whatever. It is a business proposition and private enterprise can and will finance it. We propose through the establishment of a rural-colony foundation (plans soon to be made public) to issue to the public agricultural war bonds for the purpose of financing men above and below the draft age for military service, and those who are unfit for military service but are fitted to farm. It is, however, especially the business of the Government to care for the dependent families of soldiers, and with the very reasonable amount of money asked for in this amendment the Government will afford great assistance to our larger work in furthering our program for colonization because the Government funds will be immediately available and available in sufficient quantities to establish and prove the value of the standard herein recommended. You do not expect to establish a plant for the manufacture of munitions without first investing large capital and getting the plant ready. No more can agriculture be properly and profitably manufactured until there is equipment—business organization.

A survey can be made by sending application blanks like the following through all existing Government, church, welfare, and school organizations to the end that these families be congregated:

APPLICATION FOR FARM HOME.

Surname, _____ _____. Christian name, _____ _____.
Street and number, _____.
City, _____. State, _____.
Married or single, _____. Education, _____.
Age of all members of family, _____.
Country of nativity, _____. Did you farm there? _____.
How many years in this country? _____
In what State do you wish to farm? _____
What kind of farming is preferred? _____.
What experience have you had in agriculture? _____.
Would you join a night class in agriculture? _____.
What is your religion? _____.
What amount of capital is available? _____.
Occupation, _____.

We should remember that many parts of the United States have an all-the-year-round growing season, and we should have in mind the placing of these families in so far as possible where they will have the advantage of the long growing season, not alone because of the extra crop production thus guaranteed, but because the cost of clothing, housing, fuel, etc., is materially lessened. Experienced farmers can go into the North and West for the heavier work of grain production. As far as possible these emergency farm settlements should conform to known laws of rural economics and should be made to articulate with what must come later in the way of permanent repopulation of our rural districts.

Mr. Hoover said at his hearing, June 19:

"Despite the rigid measure adopted to reduce consumption among the allies, they shall require to import next year larger amounts of cereals and meats than ever before. The large failure of the winter-wheat harvest in France and England, larger consumption by armies in the field and munition workers, the reduced productivity of the land by reduction in man power, the sinking of cargoes by submarines—all pile up one increasing demand upon another, despite the efforts of the women in the fields. Moreover, the allies are more isolated to-day in their sources of food than ever before, even during the war. It requires three times the tonnage and double the danger to bring wheat from Australia and India than from the Atlantic seaboard, and to-day these sources are largely unavailable. The crop failure in the Argentine gives no hope from that quarter until next March or April, and the allies are of course, isolated from the normal supply of Russia, Roumania, and Bulgaria. They are thus dependent upon North America for the vast majority of their food imports.

"A preliminary view of our harvest and our own normal consumption would indicate that without any special endeavor we would be able to supply from North America, say, 60 per cent of what they would require. The deficiency of 40 per cent must be made up of self-denial on their part and rigid economy and saving of waste on our part. I am confident that, with sufficient endeavor on both sides, we can increase our surplus to meet her reduced demands. It in any event means privation to them, but such effort on our part guarantees their constancy in the war, for without adequate food supply no European population will continue the fight, and we shall find ourselves alone as the enemy of Germany.

"We already have one bitter experience constantly in the forefront of our minds of identical character. The revolution in Russia was a food riot wherein the violences of starving thousands was seized upon, not by the moderates of the country for progressive development of government and continuation in war, but by the radical and pacifist element, and we see unfolding before our eyes at least the temporary paralysis of an ally. The price is worth paying in autocratic Russia, but not in the western democracies. If through any failure of ours we should bring about this situation among our western allies or among our own people, there will rest upon us the responsibility for a failure of civilization and government larger than has ever rested upon a nation."

If this money is appropriated, it will accomplish an immediate increase in food production through the efforts of the dependent families so colonized and will give ideal home surroundings to thousands now living in such conditions as make patriotism difficult. It will also afford an example for commercial colonization the value of which can not be overestimated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to laying aside the unfinished business temporarily, that the Senate may proceed with the consideration of Senate bill 1854? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] is entitled to the floor.

LEGALIZING STANDARD TIME.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1854) to save daylight and to provide standard time for the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not intend to take any further time of the Senate other than simply to say that at that time when I introduced the bill into the Senate, by request, I had a great deal of correspondence upon the measure, and I will say to the Senator from Arkansas that I suppose 90 per cent of all of it was in favor of the bill. The only real objectors at that time were the railroads of the country, and the railroads claimed that it would be rather unfortunate to pass the legislation. It was for that reason, and that only, at this time, that I rose to ask the question I did. I have no objection whatever to the passage of the bill. I hope it will accomplish all that the advocates of the measure think it will accomplish. With that statement I am perfectly willing to vote for the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a short paper in reference to this measure.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask the Senator if it was prepared by him or by some one else?

Mr. CALDER. It is a statement prepared by me, but it contains the views of different societies of the country on the subject.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It has always been, I understand, contrary to the custom of the Senate to permit a Senator to extend his remarks in the RECORD, as is the practice in another body. I myself think it is a good rule. I do not believe we ought to get into the practice here of Senators extending their remarks in the RECORD. I shall have to object to the request of the Senator from New York.

Mr. CALDER. I had no intention of printing a speech in the RECORD. I will change the request and ask to have printed in the RECORD the views of the United States Chamber of Commerce in connection with the matter.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have no objection to that.

Mr. ROBINSON. I call the attention of the Senator from New York to the fact that the report of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States was ordered printed in connection with the remarks I made.

Mr. CALDER. Then I withdraw my request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York withdraws his request.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. UNDERWOOD rose.

Mr. FLETCHER. I understand the Senator from Alabama has risen to move a recess. I was going to propose an executive session. We shall need to have an executive session at some time later, and I see no reason why we should not have it now.

Mr. NELSON. I wish the Senator would move an executive session.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Before the Senator from Florida makes a motion to go into executive session I ask that the unfinished business may be laid before the Senate so that it may be pending when the Senate resumes legislative business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 2463.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 2 hours and 10 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

CONSERVATION OF FOOD AND FUEL.

Mr. GORE. By direction of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry I report back favorably, with amendments, the bill (H. R. 4961) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. McKELLAR submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 4961) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel, which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, June 28, 1917, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate June 27, 1917.

SOLICITOR FOR THE DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

Lester Hood Woolsey to be Solicitor for the Department of State.

PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE.

Dr. Edwin Howard Settle to be assistant surgeon in the Public Health Service.

Dr. Harry Evans Trimble to be assistant surgeon in the Public Health Service.

RECEIVER OF PUBLIC MONEYS.

John S. Hunter to be receiver of public moneys at Montgomery, Ala.

REGISTERS OF THE LAND OFFICE.

Cato D. Glover to be register of the land office at Montgomery, Ala.

James F. Burgess to be register of the land office at Lakeview, Oreg.

Wade H. Fowler to be register of the land office at Douglas, Wyo.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, June 27, 1917.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Teach us, O Lord, Thy ways, and give us the disposition, strength, courage, to walk therein; that we may be faithful servants unto Thee and unto our fellow men. For it is not what we get out of the world but what we put into it that makes for nobility of soul.

Heaven is not reached at a single bound;
But we build the ladder by which we rise
From the lowly earth to the vaulted skies,
And we mount to its summit round by round.

Thus may we strive, struggle, serve, attain, in the spirit of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the river and harbor bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the river and harbor bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. POLK. Mr. Speaker, I have a telegram from Henry B. Scott, chairman of the Red Cross Committee of Delaware, that I would like to have read.

Mr. WALSH. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects.

DIVERSION OF WATER, NIAGARA RIVER.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when action on the bills from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce shall be have been concluded, the resolution reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs extending the authority of the Secretary of War to issue temporary permits for the diversion of water from the Niagara River above the Falls shall be in order.

Mr. GILLETT. For the present, I object. I think we had better wait.

RIVERS AND HARBORS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects.

This is Calendar Wednesday, and under the special order of the House the river and harbor bill (H. R. 4285) is the special order. The bill was ordered to a third reading.

The bill was read a third time.

The SPEAKER. Last night, so the Chair understands, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] demanded the reading of the engrossed copy of the bill. He is not here to withdraw his request, and the Chair supposes we will have to go through with that performance.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, while I have not the authority I will jump it. I feel authorized to withdraw that demand.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] assumes the responsibility of withdrawing that demand.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I make the motion to recommit the bill.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HULBERT. I would like to know whether it would be in order to ask unanimous consent that the reading of the engrossed bill be dispensed with?

The SPEAKER. That would have been in order if the gentleman from Illinois had not gotten in ahead.

Mr. HULBERT. That would relieve the gentleman from Illinois from responsibility, if that is the legal way to do it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the reading of the engrossed copy of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. SEARS. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] stated last night, so that a number of Members could hear him on the floor of the House, that if a certain agreement were made he would not press that demand.

The SPEAKER. Of course, everybody knows what it was done for. It was done to force an adjournment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes the motion to recommit.

Mr. TREADWAY. And on that I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

The Clerk read as follows:

Moved by Mr. TREADWAY: That the bill (H. R. 4285) be recommitted to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors with instructions to report back the bill forthwith with the following amendment: After the word "named," in line 9, on page 1, insert the following:

"Provided, That no money shall be expended for any item of maintenance in this act until the President of the United States has certified that in his judgment it is necessary for the commercial needs of the country or for the successful prosecution of the present war: And provided further, That no money shall be expended for any new project, survey, or continuing improvement until the President of the United States has certified that in his judgment it is necessary for the successful prosecution of the present war."

The SPEAKER. On that motion the gentleman from Massachusetts moves the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. TREADWAY. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts demands a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 42, noes 63.

Mr. TREADWAY. I make the point of no quorum, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes the point that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of recommitting the bill will answer "yea" when their names are called; those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 141, nays 189, answered "present" 9, not voting 91, as follows:

So the bill was passed.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

For the session:

Mr. STEELE with Mr. BUTLER.

Until further notice:

Mr. SHALLENBERGER with Mr. CLASSON.

Mr. JONES of Virginia with Mr. HUTCHINSON.

Mr. MAHER with Mr. PRATT.

On the vote:

Mr. PARKER of New York (for) with Mr. DUNN (against).

Mr. DALE of New York (for) with Mr. KREIDER (against).

Mr. SULLIVAN (for) with Mr. GANDY (against).

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY (for) with Mr. KIESS of Pennsylvania (against).

Mr. ALMON (for) with Mr. BARNHART (against).

Mr. BLACKMON (for) with Mr. HELVERING (against).

Mr. OVERMYER (for) with Mr. MCCULLOCH (against).

Mr. SHERWOOD (for) with Mr. CLAYPOOL (against).

Mr. DENTON (for) with Mr. COOPER of Ohio (against).

Mr. BROWNING (for) with Mr. LEHLBACH (against).

Mr. SCOTT of Pennsylvania (for) with Mr. DEWALT (against).

Mr. WARD (for) with Mr. WINSLOW (against).

Mr. FRANCIS (for) with Mr. HAMILTON of New York (against).

Mr. SNYDER (for) with Mr. PAIGE (against).

Mr. LEE of Georgia (for) with Mr. ROWLAND (against).

Mr. PETERS (for) with Mr. PURNELL (against).

Mr. VARE (for) with Mr. FESS (against).

Mr. EDMONDS (for) with Mr. STEVENSON (against).

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania (for) with Mr. MCFADDEN (against).

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I desire to withdraw my vote of "no" and answer "present."

The name of Mr. WINSLOW was called, and he answered "Present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. SMALL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing two letters, the first in reply to one of mine in regard to the Irish question and the other, not so long——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I could not hear the request of the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts reserves the right to object.

Mr. MASON. The first letter which I offer as an extension of my remarks is a letter of considerable length from Mr. Seumas O'Sheil in regard to a question which I asked him in regard to the Irish question, to be brief. The other——

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert a shorter letter from Mr. Moore upon the question of conscription.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan objects.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from New York rise?

Mr. HULBERT. To prefer a unanimous-consent request. On the 25th of June I introduced a bill (H. R. 5185) to provide for French instruction in the United States Army and training camps. I have consulted the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, and he believes the bill should have been referred to that committee, but because it contained an appropriation it was referred to the Committee on Appropriations. After consultation with the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT], I ask unanimous consent for a change of reference and that that bill be sent to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER. What is it about?

Mr. HULBERT. The bill appropriates $500,000, or so much thereof as the Secretary of War may deem necessary, for the purpose of employing instructors at training camps to teach the soldiers intended to be sent to France the French language.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I am not sure I am opposed to the gentleman's bill, but in the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations I shall object for the present.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. EAGLE was granted leave of absence for two weeks, on account of important business.

COMMITTEE TO MEET AND ESCORT THE BELGIAN COMMISSION.

The SPEAKER. At 1 o'clock the Belgian commission is to be here, and the Chair appoints Messrs. FLOOD, CHARLES B. SMITH, SHACKLEFORD, RAGSDALE, COOPER of Wisconsin, PORTER, and Foss as a committee to receive and escort them.

GASES IN WARFARE.

The SPEAKER. Under an order of the House the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] is permitted to proceed for one hour on the subject of gases used in trenches.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TILSON. In case it should require the full hour to make the presentation, shall I suspend prior to 1 o'clock and then resume after the Belgian commission has been received?

The SPEAKER. The Chair should think the gentleman may exercise his own judgment. It would keep the commissioners waiting——

Mr. TILSON. I should prefer, Mr. Speaker, when the time approaches that the Speaker notify me, and I will suspend if I have not finished and then resume after the commission has been received.

The SPEAKER. All right.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, before beginning my remarks I wish to correct, to some extent, an impression inadvertently given when leave to address the House was first granted me two days ago. It was stated broadly that I was to speak on the subject of aeronautics. Aeronautics come in and play a very prominent part in what I have to say, but I wish to confine my remarks to the possibilities of fighting in and from aircraft, which is in some respects a continuation of what I said the other day about the use of weapons in and from the air.

I wish to state in the first place that I am not an advocate of frightfulness and that I am opposed to the use of any means of warfare not recognized by the latest and highest advancement of international law. [Applause.] I should deprecate a reversion to more primitive methods and should not agree to it except it should chance to be against an enemy who first employed those methods.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield just there?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Does the gentleman mean to say that he would use the same methods that his enemy used?

Mr. TILSON. I did not say that I would use all the methods that the enemy used, but this will illustrate what I meant to say: Suppose that another gentleman and myself were to agree to settle matters in a fight with the weapons that nature gave us, and we were proceeding in that fashion. If the other fellow should draw a small knife and begin to carve my person, I should not continue to pummel him with my fists, but if I had a larger knife I should use it. [Applause.]

We did not begin this war. We confidently expect to finish it. In doing so we may be forced to use the same means used by the enemy and go him one better. In fact, we must use the weapons the enemy has forced into our hands.

Some of the things I shall refer to are so vile and horrible that I feel like promising the House that when we have won this war by these means and others, if it be necessary to atone for the unpleasant things I have brought to your attention, including the horrible weapons heretofore presented and some things I shall mention to-day, such as noxious gases and the like, if you will promise to forgive me for all this I agree that in that peaceful day I shall try to rival the Queen of Sheba in dispensing aromatic perfumes. I agree to bring into the House a whole drug store of cosmetics and try to laden the air with attar of roses. I agree to release in the House a flock of turtledoves and stand treat to the entire membership on grape juice. [Applause.]

The foundation of what I have to say to-day is aviation. Long before we became engaged in this war I was one of those who raised my feeble voice in this House and elsewhere in favor of preparedness along the line of aviation. I always urged the largest appropriations that the executive department believed could be spent advantageously, and was ready to vote more if the officials in charge thought they could use it, because I believed it the most important agency for us to develop for our national defense. I even advocated on one occasion that the Post Office Department in its great work should use these machines more largely, not only because it would be a useful vehicle for carrying important mail matter rapidly, but because of the impetus it would give to the development of aviation which could eventually be used in war if need be.

Since our entry into this war I have observed every report coming from the other side, and I am more firmly convinced than ever that our road to victory is through the air. [Applause.] I do not mean by that that we shall simply gain superiority, but we must have complete supremacy, and that, as I understand it, is the purpose of the War Department to-day. It will require a large sum of money. Mr. Howard E. Coffin, chairman of the advisory committee of the Council of National Defense, makes a suggestion of $600,000,000, and I am for that. [Applause.] Mr. Hawley, of the Aero Club, favors $1,000,000,000, and I believe we shall come to that very soon. If we do spend a billion dollars, or two billions, for that matter, and thereby both win the war and save a million precious lives of our young men, those staggering sums will be a mere bagatelle. [Applause.]

Let us take into consideration the magnitude of some of the problems we have before us. When it is attempted to send millions of men to fight out this war in the trenches, the difficulty of the transportation problem of the men alone is not small. Then if we add to this the equipment and all the necessary paraphernalia to wage a war that we must carry along and constantly increase, the evergrowing amount of ammunition that we must send over, the steady stream of food that must never cease to flow, the immensity of the problem will be appreciated. All you need to do is to sit down, take a pencil, and begin to figure out the amount of transportation necessary for all these things, say, for 2,000,000 men, and you can see one of the difficulties in the way. Even 2,000,000 additional men against an intrenched foe might not turn the scale, and the millions might have to be several times increased. I believe, however, that if we could have a hundred thousand men in the air it would make such an overwhelming fleet that it would blind the eyes of our enemy and carry the war itself far over the trenches into the enemy's territory. After all, gentlemen, complete military victories are seldom won on your own territory. To win out you must take the offensive and carry the war home to the other fellow.

Germany has used psychology in this war to a great extent. Great Britain and France have used it scarcely at all. We all recall how, in the early days of the war, while Belgian forts were being pounded to atoms and fair Belgium herself was being devastated, we heard on every tongue and read in every newspaper of the wonderful deeds of the 42-centimeter guns. No one outside of Germany had heard or thought of such guns being used as semimobile guns. It appealed to the imagination. Miniatures of it were worn as badges on the breasts of fair women and old men in Germany, while the real article pounded its way almost to the gates of Paris.

Next came the Zeppelin raids. The total aggregate damage done was not large, comparatively, but it struck terror to the hearts of the people of England. We are compelled to-day to write down the Zeppelin as a practical failure when considered as an offensive weapon of warfare; at any rate, that it does not compensate for the great cost; but the psychological effect was considerable.

Even the sly, deadly U-boat was utilized in the same way. How dramatically that unspeakable tragedy of the Lusitania was staged! Semiofficial warning was given by advertising in the papers and otherwise advising people not to go on that ship. It was all too horrible for the average American mind to visualize as a possibility. It was thought to be so horrible that it was hardly observed, and certainly not heeded by our people.

Then that fatal day at Ypres, after long and careful preparation, 50 tons of chlorine gas to a mile of trench was turned loose opposite that sector of the line held by the gallant Canadians. Twenty-five per cent of those brave fellows were killed and the whole line terrorized for a time.

Air supremacy, as I say, is necessary to carry out the plan I have in mind of ending this war with the minimum loss of American lives, and we can secure it. In the first place, it takes men of superb courage and daring. We have the men of that kind. The aeroplane is a Yankee invention. The eagle is an American institution. The air is ours by right. We can make it so by might. [Applause.] Such a program will require a considerable amount of money. Fortunately—and I do not say it boastingly—we have the money. If by the expenditure of money in that way we can serve the purpose better, and at the same time save sending millions of our young men to the trenches, then it is worth all it may cost.

Now, a word as to the advancement made in aviation before I proceed to another part of my subject. I shall not attempt to go into a history of aeronautics; that is familiar to all and not necessary to the matter that I have in hand. At the beginning of the war each side had a few aeroplanes. The subject had appealed to the imaginative Frenchman more than it had to us or to the English. So France had quite a number. Germany, of course, following out her practice of thorough preparedness in everything, was well prepared with aeroplanes. At the Battle of the Marne aeroplanes cut a considerable figure. The Germans had the old Taube machine and the French had the old Nieuport and others. These machines made something like 70 or 80 miles an hour. At once both sides set to developing this art, and very soon they were turning out machines on both sides that made very much in excess of those figures. First came the German Fokker, and gained superiority for the Germans. Then the Nieuport and other French machines were improved, and so it has gone, with superiority first going to one side and then to the other. Both sides now claim to have machines that will make the incredible speed of 140 miles an hour, and that will climb in the air 10,000 feet in 13 minutes. It is hoped to make it in 10 minutes very soon.

Then the size of the machines has been greatly increased. The old machine was made to carry 1 man or 2 at the most, and some thought that was the limit of the size of aeroplanes. The development in size has gone on until to-day larger machines are flying than ever were thought possible. To-day smaller ones than any practical constructor dreamed of are being successfully flown. Take the big machines of the Handley-Page type, in which 11 men have flown from London to Rome in the night time. Such a machine is so large that it can take two little aeroplanes with their aviators on the wings, go up in the air 10,000 feet, and launch the small machines from the wings of the big one. That feat actually has been done. A machine of this larger type, which it is necessary to fly lower and which now usually flies at night, when we are able to take and hold complete supremacy of the air we shall be able to use in the daytime.

The weapons that can be used from aircraft are practically all of those that can be used on the land, up to and including the Davis 3-inch recoilless gun, and a number that can be used in no other way, as I shall show in the case of certain drop bombs. I have on former occasions spoken of the use of pistols, rifles, and machine guns from aeroplanes. The machine gun especially is extremely important, but I shall not repeat what I have said on the subject.

I also referred to the use from aeroplanes of fragmentation bombs, especially the Barlow bomb. At that time I told the House that this bomb had not yet received its final test. The test was held at the Hampton grounds a few days ago. It was dropped from aeroplanes at great heights, so as to thoroughly test it, especially as to accuracy and destructiveness. I do not think it advisable to give you the official figures, but I am permitted to say that the results were highly satisfactory in every respect, and that the officers having the matter in charge are quite enthusiastic. [Applause.] This bomb, in my opinion, is sure to be heard from before the war is over. Not only is great credit due to the inventive genius of Mr. Barlow, but to the Ordnance Department, and especially to the commandant and other officials of Frankford Arsenal, under whose special guidance this young man's fertile ideas were so satisfactorily worked out. I am informed that an up-to-date corporation of patriotic men have made all preparations necessary to manufacture these bombs in large quantities under whatever arrangement the Government may deem necessary and proper.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Some time ago there was a great deal of talk in administration circles about the espionage bill, with the view largely to preventing the notifying of the enemy of plans of the administration and of this Government. I note now, however, that much talk has been indulged in in administration circles that has gotten into the newspapers with respect to the plans of our Government as to the conduct of the war. Does not the gentleman think that already much of value to the enemy has been disclosed with respect to the use of the aeroplane and the bomb in connection with it?

Mr. TILSON. Probably so, and I would say it was absolutely so, if it were not for the fact that we are almost certain that everything that has been revealed, certainly through the newspapers or through the wide circulation of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, is already known to Germany. I am sure that all I have presented in connection with the bomb——

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I do not refer to what the gentleman has stated on a former occasion and now. But I have been wondering if there was a purpose on the part of the War Department to disclose to the world and to the enemy just what our plans are?

Mr. TILSON. I do not believe so. I think a certain amount of publicity as to general plans is absolutely necessary, because those matters have got to come before this House for appropriations, and this House is going to insist on knowing a certain amount of detail in regard to them. I believe that what has been given out is no more than what would be required in this House before enormous appropriations of that kind would be made.

Now, as my time is going I wish to refer to one additional means of fighting from the air. In addition to the fragmentation bombs there is a large field to which I have not heretofore referred, and that is gas bombs. Fighting with gas is worthy of an entire chapter by itself. The use of gas as a weapon of defense, like many of the other weapons now in common use in the armies of Europe, such as the catapult, flame projector, trench knife, and sling, is an inheritance from the early ages amplified, improved, and made more destructive by the aid of modern science.

The first recorded effort to overcome the enemy by the generation of poisonous and suffocating gases seems to have been in the wars of the Athenians and Spartans (431 to 404 B. C.), when in besieging the cities of Platea and Belium the Spartans saturated wood with pitch and sulphur and burnt it under the walls of these cities in the hope of choking the defenders and rendering the assault less difficult. They also melted pitch, charcoal, and sulphur together in cauldrons and blew the fumes over the defenders' lines by means of bellows.

"Greek fire" was used by the Byzantine Greeks under Constantine about 673 A. D. to destroy the Saracens, and Saracens in turn used it as a weapon of defense against the Christians during the crusades. This Greek fire had the double advantage of being not only inflammable but also generating during the process of combustion clouds of dense blinding smoke and gas of an asphyxiating character. Its chemical composition was supposed to be a mixture of quicklime, petroleum, sulphur, and such other inflammable substances as pitch, resin, etc. Upon the addition of water the slaking process which the quicklime underwent generated enough heat to ignite the petroleum which in turn ignited the resin, pitch, and sulphur. This flaming mixture was delivered against the enemy by means of phantastic syringes in the shape of dragons and other monsters with wide jaws.

The first use of gas in modern warfare occurred April 22, 1915, when the Germans liberated great clouds of gas against the allied trenches near Ypres with a resulting complete demoralization of the troops and a large number of casualties.

Coincident with the use of the "gas cloud" the Germans began to use gas also in bombs, hand grenades, and shells. From this beginning gas has now become recognized as one of the accepted arms of the military service and is being used very extensively in all armies, especially in the form of gas shells.

Before proceeding to speak of the different kinds of gases, or the methods of attack with gases, I think I should first address myself to the defense against gases, because that is the way, mind you, in which we approach it. The gases were used against the Canadian troops contrary to The Hague convention, but are now generally used, not only by the enemy but by the allies themselves. The first problem that the allies had to face was defense against it. As I have stated, on April 22, 1915, opposite the Ypres salient the Germans turned loose 50 tons of chlorine gas to the mile of front occupied. Chlorine gas is two and one-half times as heavy as air. It apparently rolls along the ground in a greenish-yellow cloud. As soon as it reaches the vicinity of the dugouts, being heavier than air, it immediately goes down into the dugout and remains there until removed. The allies had to meet this problem, and they began meeting it at once. Some Germans were captured who had gas masks, and in a few days every woman in France that could find any material out of which to make these things were making gas masks—imperfect, crude things at first, but they improved rapidly. A gas mask is absolutely necessary for the life of anyone who is exposed to these deadly gases.

I have brought here to-day three types of masks that are used in defense against noxious gases. With his consent, I am going to ask the gentleman from Ohio, Capt. HEINTZ, who is always a good soldier, if he will now volunteer as a victim and try on one of these masks for me. [Applause.]

While the captain is adjusting the mask I will speak briefly of the other two types. Two of the page boys have consented to put on the other two types. This one [indicating] is the British reserve mask. It must go under the coat in this way [indicating]. Otherwise it is of no value.

You will notice the difficulty with this type. This air valve has the one end in the mouth, so that the person using it must be able to breathe through the nose, because this valve only works outwardly. Thus, stopping the mouth with the outward valve makes it necessary to use the nose for breathing in order to get any breath at all. The air, of course, goes through this fabric which is saturated with the neutralizing chemical. This is the type used by the French [indicating]. It has the advantage of simplicity. You can breathe either through the mouth or through the nose, but the breath must go out and in through the fabric. There is no outlet at all. This one [the British reserve mask] is not absolutely proof against gas for a long period. Therefore it is used only in reserve by men 4 or 5 miles back of the lines. The British in the trenches most liable to be exposed to gas are required to have this type [the box-respirator type]. In fact it is now required that the men shall have both of these.

This mask that the gentleman from Ohio is now putting on is adapted from one that was first made by the British which in turn they adapted from one captured from the Germans. It has been improved to some extent as time has gone on. We think we have improved it in these that we have been manufacturing for our own troops. This one that the gentleman from Ohio has on is absolutely proof against gas for 10 hours, it is said. When the gentleman from Ohio tried it on the other day and I was saying to a bystander that a man could live in it from seven to eight hours, as soon as the captain got that valve out of his mouth he protested that he would not like to try to live seven or eight hours in that mask. [Laughter.] It is, however, absolutely proof against these deadly gases, which, after all, is the important matter.

This [indicating] is a canister containing the chemicals. Here is the same rubber valve that the other has, that you breathe through outwardly. It has a pair of clampers on the nose, so that the man can not breathe through his nose at all.

In the reserve mask he must breathe through his nose. In this one a man can not breathe through his nose at all, but must breathe through his mouth. There are some men who can not breathe through the nose, but all men, so far as I know, can breathe through the mouth. This one—box-respirator type—is absolutely proof against any gas that has as yet been used.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. HAMLIN. The air passing through the chemical neutralizes the gas, does it, that the enemy sets afloat?

Mr. TILSON. It does; and it is the intention, as I understand, of our War Department to test these things and to actually turn the gas on men wearing them as a matter of trial before they are exposed to the enemy.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the chemical in the canister destroy any gas, irrespective of the gases that are thrown by the enemy?

Mr. TILSON. Against all gases that have been used thus far, I believe, this chemical has proved to be an antidote.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. What does that cost?

Mr. TILSON. This box-respirator type costs about $7, while this one costs from $1.50 to $1.75.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. How do the ones that the pages have on protect?

Mr. TILSON. They are saturated with chemicals and put down over the head so that you can not get any breath except air that passes through the fabric saturated with the chemical, so that the gas is neutralized. It is the same way with the French mask. The fabric is thoroughly saturated with the chemical.

Mr. BRITTEN. How long will that last?

Mr. TILSON. These smaller masks will last in gas three or four hours. This one will last longer. It is figured that a man could live in a deadly gas for 10 hours with one of these horrible things on.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Have they places where they can recharge the masks with chemicals?

Mr. TILSON. They can replace the canister.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I mean as to the other masks?

Mr. TILSON. Undoubtedly. The chemical is in a liquid form and these masks can be recharged with it.

Deadly gases have the same effect on horses, and in many cases these masks are used on horses in order to protect their lives.

Mr. HARDY. How does the breath, once taken in, get out again?

Mr. TILSON. In this one, the English reserve mask, the air having passed through this fabric and into the body through the nose, passes out through this rubber valve. The breath goes out, but when you start to draw in here that valve closes.

Mr. HARDY. It has one valve for drawing in?

Mr. TILSON. No. That is simply an exhaust valve.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. When that is exhausted a person can not live with a mask on?

Mr. TILSON. In the English reserve mask a person can live three or four hours. That is all it will last in gas.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. These chemicals have to be replaced every 10 hours, whether they are used or not, have they?

Mr. TILSON. Oh, no. This one that the gentleman from Ohio put on is charged with a chemical, but you do not smell it at all. You have no idea that the chemical is in there, and it does not appear until the deadly gases appear.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. For a question.

Mr. MEEKER. How far from the lines can these clouds of gas be sent? How far does the gas carry?

Mr. TILSON. Of course that is not possible of accurate answer. It depends upon the wind conditions, and whether the ground is smooth, and the wind is gentle or strong or all in one way. Fortunately, on the western front the prevailing winds are from the west, and it gives the Germans a slight disadvantage in cloud gases. It also depends upon the amount of gas that you have.

The gentleman understands that it is also used in shells, and it is the purpose to use it more largely. Any one who gets the supremacy of the air can use it successfully. It can be used in all kinds of containers that can be dropped from the air, and can almost destroy the artillery of the enemy if you drop enough of it to kill or put out the eyes of the gunners. The lachrymatory gases are especially effective against the artillery.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Do I understand that the cheaper or emergency masks allow the passage of air through the material of the mask, but exclude the gas?

Mr. TILSON. The air, laden with the gas, comes through the mask and is drawn in by the suction of the man's lungs, gas and air mixed. It must go through this fabric which is saturated with a chemical, and going through it the chemical neutralizes the gas, only the purified air coming through.

Mr. MONDELL. Where is the chemical?

Mr. TILSON. It is in the mask itself, and if the gentleman will come close enough to it he will be able to smell it. The material itself is saturated.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, how long will that mask remain saturated without being used?

Mr. TILSON. Indefinitely, practically. If the gentleman will pardon me, I desire to go just a little bit farther in regard to these means of ending the war. I believe that with the combination of all of the arms that we can use from the air, all kinds of guns up to 3-inch, all of these terrible bombs of which I have been speaking, and of which I have heretofore brought in several different types, and then these gas bombs which are very deadly as fired now from trench mortars and howitzers, we can do a great deal toward ending the war. I believe that with all these coupled with the increased use of the aeroplane, so that bombs, instead of being fired from mortars or howitzers, which is destructive of certain kinds of containers and renders useless certain kinds of very poisonous gases, may be dropped from the aeroplane, we can do much toward making war unbearable.

You can use other and different gases from the aeroplane than you can from the gun. There are now a number of chemists, I could not tell you how many, brilliant chemists, who are working on these problems. It is believed that with the supremacy of the air complete, the use of bombs, including the use of gases—which was forced into the hands of the allies, first being used by their adversaries—may be made the turning element in this whole contest. Think what the effect would be if used against supply depots, if used against troops in reserve, where they are supposed to be resting back of the lines; think what it would mean to have these bombs constantly falling upon them, or, even going farther back, with supremacy of the air, back over German territory. Of course, I should be in favor of warning them to take away their women, children, and old men from any part of the country that we should have to operate over, a thing, by the way, which the enemy has not done in the case of the Zeppelins which have gone over England. Having done that, you can realize what kind of terror and destruction might be brought to Germany itself by the use of all kinds of weapons used in aerial warfare, including gas bombs of every type and kind.

Mr. WOODYARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. For a question.

Mr. WOODYARD. How are we to obtain the results which we all hope for if the Germans should avail themselves of the same means of protecting their soldiers with masks, which I assume they do?

Mr. TILSON. We shall have to do it more and carry it farther back, where they will not be equipped with masks.

Mr. FARR Does the gentleman desire to say anything about the facilities we have for the making of aircraft?

Mr. TILSON. We have great facilities for the making of aircraft. There is to-day in this city a meeting of the Society of Automotive Engineers. These men know what is needed and how to get it; they are bringing great comfort to the hearts of those who are wrestling with this problem. There is great satisfaction in the progress being made in aviation, as there is along all of these lines of which I am speaking.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. As I understand it, though perhaps I have not been correctly informed, one great difficulty we have had in this country has been the construction of engines of sufficient power, and our difficulty in that respect was illustrated in Mexico.

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Have we overcome that difficulty?

Mr. TILSON. We have overcome it, as I am informed and believe.

Just one word now as to the effect of these gases. I was advised by one of my good friends that perhaps I ought not to speak of these terrible things, as it might discourage the young men of the country. I do not believe so. I believe that we should know the worst. I believe that we should know what we are going up against, so that we may nerve ourselves to the task and prepare ourselves to meet it. Gas poisoning is a horrible death, and the net results of these gases are very terrible. Of course, we hate to use them, but we do not wish them to be used upon us, and the only way to prevent it is to be prepared to use them ourselves and protect ourselves against their use, and that is what I advocate. It is the reason why I have brought these things here to-day to show how we must prepare ourselves. [Applause.]

[At this point the House took a recess, the Belgian commission appeared, and the head of the commission, Baron Moncheur, addressed the House.]

THE BELGIAN MISSION.

The SPEAKER. Under the previous order, the House will stand in recess for 30 minutes.

Accordingly (at 1 o'clock p. m.) the House took a recess until 1 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.

At 1 o'clock and 4 minutes p. m. the Sergeant at Arms announced the Belgian mission, and the members of the mission, Baron Ludovic Moncheur, Mr. de Cartier, Gen. Leclercq, Maj. Osterreith, and Count d'Ursel, accompanied by Mr. Warren Robbins, secretary of embassy, attached by the Department of State as aid to the mission, and Capt. Cook, military aid, entered the Hall of the House.

The distinguished visitors were escorted to the Speaker's rostrum amid prolonged applause and cheers.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen of the House of Representatives, from time out of mind Belgium has been known as the cockpit of Europe. [Applause.] There have been more great battles fought in Belgium than on the same acreage of land anywhere else in the civilized world.

Those of you who remember when you were wrestling with Latin in the days of your youth recall that Cæsar, in the opening words of his Commentaries, said that among the Gallic tribes the Belgians were the bravest. [Applause.] Most assuredly he was a good judge of fighting men. Within the last three years the present generation of Belgians have demonstrated beyond all controversy that they are worthy of the high encomium pronounced on their ancestors by the great Roman Imperator. [Applause.]

I now present to you Baron Moncheur, the head of the Belgian mission to this country. [Applause.]

Baron MONCHEUR. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House of Representatives, I am deeply grateful for this cordial reception by your distinguished assembly. Your sympathy and friendship will warm the hearts of all my countrymen and will give them renewed confidence for the future. We know that in the great conflict before us we have the powerful aid of the American Nation.

During my long residence in the United States some years ago I watched with interest and admiration the economic development of your country, which had been favored by the advantages of many years of peace.

During that period my own country learned from you many lessons in regard to industry and commerce and by following your example had become, although small in size and population, one of the foremost nations of the earth in the realms of commerce and industry.

But if years ago I admired your country in the fullness of prosperity and wondered at your industrial genius and the marvelous activity of your citizens, it is with even greater admiration that I now see your entire Nation rise as one man to answer the voice of your President calling upon you to put forth all your efforts and devotion for the defense of freedom and the rights of mankind. [Applause.] All the sons of America, without distinction of race or of party, have rallied to your flag. They think only of their duty to their country. They are ever ready to sacrifice their private and personal interests, and leaving behind them their dear ones, who will be plunged into grief and tears on account of their absence, they rally to the Star-Spangled Banner, which for the first time in your history has crossed the ocean to float over the battle fields of the Old World. [Applause.]

As in the Middle Ages the knights were accustomed to hold a vigil, watching their armor in the chapel, so you to-day are making that same holy and prayerful preparation for the battle to come. Everywhere you are carrying on work which day by day brings nearer the moment of supreme victory. [Applause.] While the flower of American youth is preparing itself in your splendid training camps, your shipyards, your factories, and your munition plants resound with the hum of feverish work providing your soldiers with the implements of war.

American aviation, that marvelous product of the New World, is making ready to lend its powerful aid, also, to support our armies. Is it not natural, indeed, that the American eagle should from the skies strike the deathblow to the enemy? [Applause.]

After your great stroke for liberty in 1776 you formed a society which you called the Order of the Cincinnati, to indicate that when war was finished you knew how to beat your swords into plowshares; and now, when war has been forced upon you, you have given proof that you know equally well how to turn your plowshares into swords. [Applause.] Some 20 years ago Prince Albert of Belgium, heir to a throne which seemed to be safely sheltered from the blast of war, came to America where he studied with the deepest interest your marvelous country and the wonderful works of industry and commerce which you had developed in the quietude of peace; and now how can I express the sentiments which fill his heroic soul when, fighting at the head of his troops in the last trench on Belgian soil, he sees the sons of that same industrious America land upon the coast of Europe, brave champions of the most noble principles, and ready to lay down their lives in defense of right and justice. [Applause.]

On a certain occasion a mighty sovereign declared "the Pyrenees exist no more," and to-day we can say with even more truth "There is no longer any ocean"—for endless friendship, cemented by gratitude and joint effort and triumph in the cause of justice and liberty, will forever obliterate the barrier of the seas and unite the children of old Belgium to the sons of the young and powerful Republic of the New World. [Applause.]

The members of the mission then took their places at the right of the Speaker's rostrum, and the Members of the House were presented to them.

The distinguished visitors were then escorted from the Hall of the House.

The recess having expired, the House was called to order by the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] has 21 minutes remaining.

GASES IN WARFARE.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, when I suspended, in order that the House might receive the Belgian commission, I was still speaking on the subject of gases and their use in warfare, especially from aeroplanes. I had finished practically what I had to say on that subject, and am now willing to answer questions in regard to it so far as I can.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. ROGERS. Several officers who have returned to this country from France, and who have had experience in the conditions of trench warfare, have told me that the defense against gases is so complete and thorough on both sides that by common consent practically the use of gases has been discontinued. Can the gentleman tell us anything about that?

Mr. TILSON. That is probably true as to cloud gases, which of course can be used successfully only against the front line of trenches, in which every man must be thoroughly prepared to defend himself against gases. It is our intention to have one of these respirators of the box type with every man, and a reserve mask of the type used by the French and the Belgians, so that cloud gases will probably not be used much when it is known that everybody is thoroughly prepared against them. The gentleman will note, however, that it is my expectation that these gases will be made use of from aeroplanes a great deal more than they ever have been. They have already been used, and are now being used increasingly in the form of projectiles of glass and steel containing these poisonous gases, and fired from trench mortars and howitzers. They are using these increasingly. My idea is that they will be used still more from aeroplanes when we get supremacy of the air, and that the gases being dropped suddenly from the air, perhaps at some distance back from the front line, the men behind the front line will not be so well prepared and will suffer demoralization and other damage, especially among the artillery and the reserve.

Mr. ROGERS. Is the nature of these gases such that if the bombs containing them are fired from a howitzer or dropped from an aeroplane there will be time to adjust a mask which is actually being carried by the soldier, in time to prevent his being harmed by the explosion of the container of the gas?

Mr. TILSON. There is not time. As a matter of fact, they figure that in order for a man to be sure to protect himself against cloud gases he must be ready to put these masks on in 20 seconds. The drill in putting on these masks is made as accurate as the manual of arms used by Infantry. It is intended to speed up so that a man can put one on in six seconds. Even six seconds may be too long with these deadly gases falling from the sky, going out in every direction, and a man getting a whiff of the gas before it is possible to put on his mask. That has happened. I remember one of the party with the British commissioners told of an instance showing the effect of gas shells containing the terribly poisonous gas called phosgen, which, unlike the chlorine or bromine gases, has a delayed action, so that you take it to-day and die to-morrow. The instance was one where a shell descended and two men got a whiff of the gas. A surgeon, being near, saw that they were exposed to it, and immediately ordered them to the hospital and to bed. They obeyed orders and went off to the hospital, joshing each other that two strong men should be ordered to bed with nothing the matter with them. Before the dawn of the next morning both had died horrible deaths from that awful poison.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Certainly.

Mr. McKENZIE. Would not the Germans see these flying machines coming, or, hearing them and knowing that we had resorted to the use of this outrageous way of fighting, as all agree, would not they have time to put their masks on?

Mr. TILSON. It is hoped that we are going to have so many machines in the air that they will not have to fly 10,000 feet high, but will be able to fly down nearer the ground, and in that way the Germans may have to wear their masks all day long.

The point is that only a small part of the men can be on the front at once. They take turns, and the men on the front line, subject to exposure, to cloud gases, have to be doubly prepared by having one each of these masks.

Mr. FARR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. FARR. How soon does the gentleman think that we will have all of these men in the air?

Mr. TILSON. It is too early for me to say. I would say here that conditions have been revolutionized on that subject, and there is every encouragement to lead us to believe that we are going to turn them out very rapidly. The gentleman knows that all we have to do is to standardize them. Whenever we standardize a thing we can turn it out rapidly. That is what we are going to do.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Certainly.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Independent of the construction of the machines, will the gentleman tell us how long it would take an ordinarily competent man without any experience as an aviator to become so experienced that he can operate a machine?

Mr. TILSON. That is a difficult question. The longer he operates one the better he is prepared; in fact, they have sent many young men to their death because they were not thoroughly trained. The need of them was so great that many have gone up in the air before they were prepared, and as a result have gone down to their death.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Would it be fair to say that they can be trained within a year?

Mr. TILSON. Yes; I should say, with the aptitude the average American has, with the avidity with which he goes into problems of that sort, he should be prepared in less than a year. I think it is fair to say that if they are taken very near the fighting line, where they can take it all in with every breath, they will very soon learn the business. I should say that a year is longer than would be necessary.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. I will.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman state which side, the allies or the central powers, now have the apparent superiority in the air, taking into account the prejudices of the censorship? What is the gentleman's opinion?

Mr. TILSON. My opinion is not good for much, because it is founded on information that is open to everybody—from reading the newspaper reports and the official reports, from which I get more information than in any other way. You can sometimes tell a great deal by what they do not say in one of the official reports. I believe from all this that the allies have a superiority to-day in the number of machines and the weight they will carry. I believe that the Germans have a superiority in climbing. A climbing machine is a very necessary thing. If you can take the upper berth above the other fellow and come down on him at a speed of 200 miles an hour, you can make it a very deadly matter.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. After all, is it not a very difficult thing to standardize the time at which the aviator will arrive and become an expert, because it is the case of individual temperament and aptitude?

Mr. TILSON. It is.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. And the fact is that equations vary with each individual. A man that is on the way to be a skillful aviator may be killed and his effect in the table of averages not demonstrate what his proportion would be?

Mr. TILSON. That is the case.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I want to interrupt the gentleman to say that I have understood, and I have no doubt most of us have understood, that even within the short space of three months aviators have been found so skillful that they could be employed in service back of the line and thereafter progress so that they can be advanced in service, and the three months' training has been sufficient to put men into the service behind the line.

Mr. TILSON. Some men could be picked out who would be ready. They would be so apt that in three months they would be very skillful fliers, indeed, perhaps more so than other men who took a year. There must be a great deal in the temperament in doing such a daring work as this.

If there are no other questions, I shall close these remarks by thanking first the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HEINTZ], who so kindly consented to be the victim in wearing the gas mask, and finally the Members of the House for hearing me with such apparent interest, not only on this occasion but on the occasions of other remarks made by me on the subject of weapons used on the ground, below the ground, and in the air.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. I yield.

Mr. MEEKER. I think the thanks of the House are due the gentleman for the information he has brought us. [Applause.]

Mr. TILSON. I thank the gentleman. [Long applause.]

TO AMEND THE ACT TO REGULATE COMMERCE.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday. The House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 1816, and the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMPSON] will take the chair. [Applause.]

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (S. 1816), with Mr. THOMPSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill, the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1816) to amend the act to regulate commerce, as amended, and for other purposes.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I would be glad to know how much time I have consumed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 40 minutes remaining.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point the report which our committee made on this bill, without reading it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point the report of the committee. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1816) to amend the act to regulate commerce, as amended, and for other purposes, having considered the same, report thereon with amendment and as so amended recommend that it pass.

Amend the bill as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That section 24 of an act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, as amended, be further amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 24. That the Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby enlarged so as to consist of nine members, with terms of seven years, and each shall receive $10,000 compensation annually. The qualifications of the members and the manner of the payment of their salaries shall be as already provided by law. Such enlargement of the commission shall be accomplished through appointment by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, of two additional Interstate Commerce Commissioners, one for a term expiring December 31, 1921, and one for a term expiring December 31, 1922. The terms of the present commissioners, or of any successor appointed to fill a vacancy caused by the death or resignation of any of the present commissioners, shall expire as heretofore provided by law. Their successors and the successors of the additional commissioners herein provided for shall be appointed for the full term of seven years, except that any person appointed to fill a vacancy shall be appointed only for the unexpired term of the commissioner whom he shall succeed. Not more than five commissioners shall be appointed from the same political party.'

"SEC. 2. That section 17 of said act, as amended, be further amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 17. That the commission may conduct its proceedings in such manner as will best conduce to the proper dispatch of business and to the ends of justice. The commission shall have an official seal, which shall be judicially noticed. Any member of the commission may administer oaths and affirmations and sign subpœnas. A majority of the commission shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business, except as may be otherwise herein provided, but no commissioner shall participate in any hearing or proceeding in which he has any pecuniary interest. The commission may, from time to time, make or amend such general rules or orders as may be requisite for the order and regulation of proceedings before it, or before any division of the commission, including forms of notices and the service thereof, which shall conform, as nearly as may be, to those in use in the courts of the United States. Any party may appear before the commission or any division thereof and be heard in person or by attorney. Every vote and official act of the commission, or of any division thereof, shall be entered of record, and its proceedings shall be public upon the request of any party interested.

"'The commission is hereby authorized by its order to divide the members thereof into as many divisions as it may deem necessary, which may be changed from time to time. Such divisions shall be denominated, respectively, division one, division two, etc. Any commissioner may be assigned to and may serve upon such division or divisions as the commission may direct, and the senior in service of the commissioners constituting any of said divisions shall act as chairman thereof. In case of vacancy in any division, or of absence or inability to serve thereon of any commissioner thereto assigned, the chairman of the commission, or any commissioner designated by him for that purpose, may temporarily serve on said division until the commission shall otherwise order.

"'The commission may by order direct that any of its work, business, or functions arising under this act, or under any act amendatory thereof, or supplemental thereto, or under any amendment which may be made to any of said acts, or under any other act or joint resolution which has been or may hereafter be approved, or in respect of any matter which has been or may be referred to the commission by Congress or by either branch thereof, be assigned or referred to any of said divisions for action thereon, and may by order at any time amend, modify, supplement, or rescind any such direction. All such orders shall take effect forthwith and remain in effect until otherwise ordered by the commission.

"'In conformity with and subject to the order or orders of the commission in the premises, each division so constituted shall have power and authority by a majority thereof to hear and determine, order, certify, report, or otherwise act as to any of said work, business, or functions so assigned or referred to it for action by the commission, and in respect thereof the division shall have all the jurisdiction and powers now or then conferred by law upon the commission, and be subject to the same duties and obligations. Any order, decision, or report made or other action taken by any of said divisions in respect of any matters so assigned or referred to it shall have the same force and effect, and may be made, evidenced, and enforced in the same manner as if made or taken by the commission as a whole. The secretary and seal of the commission shall be the secretary and seal of each division thereof.

"'In all proceedings relating to the reasonableness of rates or to alleged discriminations not less than three members shall sit in the hearing and participate in the decision; and in all hearings relating to the valuation of railway property under the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, by providing for a valuation of the several classes of property of carriers subject thereto, and securing information concerning their stocks, bonds, and other securities," approved March 1, 1913, not less than seven members shall sit in the hearing and participate in the decision.

"'The salary of the secretary of the commission shall be $7,500 per annum.

"'Nothing in this section contained, or done pursuant thereto, shall be deemed to divest the commission of any of its powers.'

"SEC. 3. So much of section 18 of the act to regulate commerce as fixes the salary of the secretary of the commission is hereby repealed."

In support of the action of the committee striking out all after the enacting clause of the Senate bill and inserting the identical substance and language of House bill 3650, reported by the committee and now pending on the Union Calendar in the House, your committee adopts the following language of the report made in support of that bill:

"The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3650) to amend the act to regulate commerce, as amended, and for other purposes, having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it pass.

"Your committee has long been of opinion that this bill should pass. In the Sixtieth Congress this committee reported to the House and the House passed a bill increasing the commission to nine members because it was then manifestly necessary in order to transact the increasing business of the commission, which had largely been increased by the Hepburn bill of 1906 and other bills. The business of the commission has been much more largely increased by several enactments since, and it is not only necessary to increase the number but also to permit the body itself, by authority of law, to subdivide itself into different units so as to distribute the work and give adequate consideration to the various important matters committed to that commission. The work at present is so onerous and diversified that it is impossible for the commissioners to give personal attention to the various cases and complaints filed, and there is occasional discontent and criticism that the cases can not receive the personal attention of the commissioners themselves, but have to be heard and passed upon by agents and examiners. It is believed that if this bill passes these complaints will cease because the cause thereof will be removed and a commission with nine members, with authority to subdivide itself into three or more subdivisions each with authority to act, will be able to give its own official attention to all matters of business that come before it.

"The President himself in urging the joint committee thought that this matter should not be referred to the joint committee proposed in Senate joint resolution 60 nor have its consideration delayed nor prevented by the passage of that resolution. Although strongly recommending that the joint committee be raised as provided in Senate joint resolution 60, the President has expressly requested that this bill should be reported separately and passed by Congress, as it is urgently demanded to meet the present emergency.

"It will be observed that in authorizing the commission to subdivide itself, a minimum number is prescribed for acting on two important matters. Not less than three, according to this bill, shall pass on the reasonableness of rates, and not less than seven shall pass on the physical valuation of railroad property. The reasons for these exceptions are obviously based on their importance."

In further support of the action of the committee the report made to the Senate by the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate on the Senate bill is printed, as follows:

"The Committee on Interstate Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1816) to amend the act to regulate commerce as amended, and for other purposes, having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it do pass.

"A report made by this committee upon a similar bill during the Sixty-fourth Congress, which is hereto attached and made a part hereof, fully states the facts upon which the bill is based.

[S. Rept. No. 437, 64th Cong., 1st sess.]

"The Committee on Interstate Commerce reports favorably the bill (H. R. 308) to amend the act to regulate commerce, as amended, with a view to increasing the membership of the Interstate Commerce Commission and authorizing the commission to divide the members thereof into as many divisions as it may deem necessary. A copy of the bill is contained in the hearing hereto annexed.

"A hearing was held by the Senate committee at which the views of the Interstate Commerce Commission on the bill were furnished by Hon. Edgar E. Clark, a member of the commission. Regarding the growth of the work of the commission, Commissioner Clark made the following statement:

"'As illustrative of the growth of this character of our work let us take the year 1906—the year in which the commission was increased from five to seven—and compare it with last year. We had in 1906 on the informal docket 1,002 cases. In 1915 we had 6,385. On the special docket, which we established in 1907, we had, in 1907, 761 cases. In 1915 we had 6,670. On the formal docket in 1906 we disposed of 82 cases. In 1915 we disposed of 1,378—that means cases in which there were contests, full hearings, generally oral arguments and briefs, and printed reports of the commission. In 1910 we were given authority to suspend the proposed increases in rates. In 1910 we had 41 such proceedings, in which we suspended the rates in 25 cases and declined to suspend them in 16. In 1915 we had 531 such cases. In 1906 the commission took and considered 28,000 pages of testimony, which was, of course, supplemented by exhibits of greater or less volume in different cases. In 1915 we took and considered 202,400 pages of oral testimony.

"'That is illustrative of the growth of the work of the commission of that character, which, as we think, was really the primary purpose of the act and the constitution of the commission.'

"The full statement of Commissioner Clark is hereto annexed, and a copy of a letter from the President upon the subject is also appended to this report. It must be borne in mind also that Congress is constantly increasing the work of the commission by the enactment of new legislation and the passage of resolutions for investigations and inquiries, which add greatly to the detail work of the commission.

"It is a physical impossibility for the seven commissioners conscientiously and in a satisfactory manner to acquaint themselves with the facts and issues in so large a number of cases, many of which are very complicated and many of which are close questions, and have much time for anything else.

"In addition to this work, it must be remembered that the commission has the duty of administering the act which calls for an appraisal of the value of the railroad properties from several different standpoints. This in itself is a tremendous work. It is not physically possible for the commission to give proper attention to the work which it was created to perform originally and at the same time pass in a satisfactory manner on the multitude of questions involved in this work of valuation. The work of valuation in itself is sufficient to absorb all the time and attention of one division of the commission such as is contemplated in this bill.

"The details obtained in this valuation work must be classified and coordinated in such a manner that the commission may be enabled to defend in the courts the principles that are applied and the manner in which they are applied. If this can not be done, all the work already done will be wasted and great sums of money will be lost to the Government.

"These conditions can be met and the difficulties obviated by increasing the number of the commissioners to nine. Under the bill the commission would be authorized to subdivide itself into three divisions of three members each. Certain matters would be delegated to each division, but the commission as a whole would retain jurisdiction of any especially important matter.

"In the matter of the salary of the secretary to the commission, this committee is strongly of the opinion that such salary should be fixed at $7,500 per annum. The act as it passed originally and as it now stands provides for a salary of $3,500 for the secretary, but for several years the appropriation bills have appropriated $5,000 for this salary. The duties of the secretary are extremely onerous and the position requires a man of a very high order of ability. At present the statutory guaranty of the secretary is only $3,500, and he is at the mercy of each successive Appropriations Committee to be allowed even $5,000, and the matter would be subject to a point of order if any Member were to have his attention called to it. In view of the vastly increased work of the secretary, the character of the services involved, and the responsibilities of the office, the committee is of the opinion that the salary of the secretary should be fixed at $7,500 per annum.

"The members of this committee have given the bill the most careful consideration, and they are strongly of the opinion that the conditions that have prompted the introduction of this bill are of such grave importance that they should be met without delay."

APPENDIX 1.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, February 14, 1916.

Hon. FRANCIS G. NEWLANDS,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I had a call the other day from Mr. McChord, chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, during which I found that he was very earnestly in favor of the early passage of a bill authorizing the commission to divide itself into sections for the facilitation and more thorough treatment of its work, and that in this desire he was speaking for his colleagues of the commission. He wanted to know whether I thought that the passage of such a bill at this time would be inconsistent with my advice to Congress in my annual message to withhold further railway legislation until a thorough inquiry could be made by a special commission into the whole subject of railway regulation for the purpose of seeing in what direction we should next turn. I told him that it did not seem to me at all inconsistent with that advice and that I was thoroughly in favor of the bill allowing the commission to divide itself into sections, because it was a merely administrative improvement and would, in my opinion, be a very vast improvement, not affecting at all any of the essential matters of legislative regulation. I promised him that I would write you to this effect, and I take advantage of this opportunity to urge very warmly the immediate consideration of the measure, which, I believe, is already formulated, for conferring this authority on the commission.

Cordially and sincerely, yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

So committees of both the House and Senate are on record as having considered and reported the same bill.

A part of the Senate bill is matter that was placed on by amendment in the Senate when the bill was under consideration and is not supported by the report of the committee at all, nor was it considered by either committee.

This committee has considered that general subject several times and has never been able to conclude that the proposition contained in the amendment made in the Senate was wise and practicable. If the legislation should go on the present bill, arresting all advances by the act of Congress and compelling the commission to hold a hearing and investigate every proposed rate, it would involve such a deluge of work at this time as to paralyze the commission and nullify absolutely the benefits sought to be derived by adding two members to that body.

The making of rates in the initiative by act of Congress would be something new in our practice. At present the commission is authorized, either on its own motion or on showing made by any shipper as party interested, to inquire into the justice and reasonableness of any present rate and is permitted to extend the time for such investigation so that the commission may control its own time and by a wise and economical distribution thereof may manage to dispatch its work, at least if not now possible certainly when the commission has been increased by this bill. The proposed Senate amendment would compel an immediate investigation of all such rates proposed and involve the commission in interminable and inextricable confusion and labor. It would be desirable to reach some basis of legislation which would preserve the interests of all concerned and at the same time avoid unnecessary delay.

The commission itself has recommended a measure for relief in that respect, and probably in conference between the two Houses an agreement can be reached somewhat in line with their suggestion. This suggestion is found on page 92 of the annual report of the Interstate Commerce Commission made December 1, 1916. It will be seen that the commission insists that if Congress establishes rates and practices by direct legislation it must establish a standard as of a past date, and not present nor future, and then provide that no change can be made therein subsequent to that specified date except upon order of the commission.

It might be that something like the following language would serve the purpose, though the committee has not yet offered it as an amendment:

"That the second paragraph of section 15 of the act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, as amended, shall be, and hereby is, amended to read as follows:

"'That all the rates, fares, charges, classifications, rules, practices, and regulations existing and in force on the 1st day of January, 1915, except such as have been subsequently reduced, shall, as changed or altered by any such subsequent reduction, be held, regarded, and enforced as just and reasonable, and no change shall be made therein except upon order of the commission. In any investigation, proceeding, or hearing before the Interstate Commerce Commission to increase a rate the burden of proof to show that the proposed increase of rate is just and reasonable shall be upon the common carrier, and in every proceeding by a shipper to reduce a rate the burden of showing that rate is too high to be just and reasonable shall be upon the shipper or movant, and the commission shall give to the hearing and decision of such questions preference over all other questions pending before it and decide the same as speedily as possible.'"

The subject, however, is too important for hasty action without mature and deliberate consideration. On the other hand, the demand for the increase and relief of the Interstate Commerce Commission provided for in the original draft of both these bills is so urgent and imperative that we ought not to postpone nor jeopardize its passage or nullify its expected benefits by attaching to it any amendment, however important, which might destroy or impair its efficacy and which would be better considered and disposed of in a separate bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time, and I ask the gentleman from Wisconsin to use some time.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, the House has under consideration the bill S. 1816 with a House substitute therefor. The object of the Senate and House bills was to relieve the work of the Interstate Commerce Commission by allowing it two additional members at the same salary as now allowed the existing members. As a further form of relief both bills authorized the commission to subdivide by division, consisting of three commissioners each. These subdivisions should have allotted to them the various kinds and classes of work that the commission has to perform. The idea of the commissioners as presented to us in the testimony was that they were to have a division on tariffs, they would have a division on safety appliances, they would have a division under section 20 of the act, the section relating to accounting, and then there would be a division on valuation, and perhaps others. These divisions, if they are to expedite the work of the commission, are to have the full powers of the full commission so that the action of any division will be equivalent to the action of the full commission. Now that and the increase of the commission are practically the sole objects in the House bill, but in the Senate there was added what is known as the Smith amendment under the terms of which the method of determining increases of rates, fares, and charges, and so forth, is radically and fundamentally changed, and before I take up that amendment, which is now represented in the form of an amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] and which is already pending, offered for the information of the House, I wish to call attention to the necessity of allowing the work of the commission to be done by divisions and the work of each division to be held as the work of the full commission.

During the consideration of the bill on April 13 there was some intimation to the effect that a division of three should not have the power to determine rate questions and questions of equal importance without the formal ratification and indorsement of the full commission. It will have to be that way if this bill is to afford necessary relief to the commission. The bill as reported requires the commissioners of the division to sit in the hearings and participate in the decisions. An amendment was offered, to be considered as pending, modifying that so that it was not to be considered necessary for the commissioners to sit in all the hearings, but that it would be necessary for them to participate in the decisions. Now, if you require the commissioners of these divisions to participate in the hearings and in the decisions, it will mean that your commissioners have to travel all over the United States taking testimony just as the examiners of the commission now do in order to secure testimony. That will mean that practically during most of the year three of your nine commissioners, if you grant the two, would be away from the city of Washington, and thus lessen the number of commissioners here in the city. Not only that, but it would mean that these commissioners would lose many days of time in the course of the year while traveling from place to place. If the commissioners are not required to do the investigations in the field and travel to points where the controversy has arisen, you will have to have your hearings in Washington. The hearings in Washington will necessitate a large expenditure on the part of citizens seeking relief at the hands of the commission; therefore you have to take one horn or the other of the dilemma. In my opinion the proper plan would be to require this matter to be determined by a division sitting here in Washington—not requiring the members of that division to participate in all the hearings, in fact not requiring them to participate in the hearings.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. I will.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I see the force of what the gentleman says with reference to adding to the efficiency of the commission, but ought not there to be some provision whereby the full commission might act on certain cases of importance, cases involving new questions, rather than leave it to a single division of the commission?

Mr. ESCH. In any important rate inquiry, such as, for instance, the one that is now going on, the hearing would be by the full commission, as it was in the eastern advance-rate cases of several years ago, and, in fact, as it has been in all the more important cases relating to rates.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. I will yield.

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman from Wisconsin will permit me, perhaps my friend from Illinois did not take notice when I made the announcement that the committee will offer an amendment to the effect that the decision of any one of these divisions will be subject to approval by the commission if there be a demand in any case.

Mr. ESCH. That would, of course, if adopted, require participation by the full commission in the determination of any rate question.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Another question: Does the bill itself or this proposed amendment to the law make it imperative that the commission shall divide itself into divisions, or does it leave it optional with the commission itself as to whether it will divide and confer jurisdiction of certain branches of the work on certain divisions. I have not read the bill very carefully. I have just seen it now.

Mr. ESCH. Section 17, as amended, as found on page 10 of the pending measure, says:

That the commission may conduct its proceedings in such manner as will best conduce to the proper dispatch of business and to the ends of justice. The commission shall have an official seal, which shall be judicially noticed. Any member of the commission may administer oaths and affirmations and sign subpœnas. A majority of the commission shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business, except as may be otherwise herein provided, but no commissioner shall participate in any hearing or proceeding in which he has any pecuniary interest.

Practically all of that is existing law—

The commission may, from time to time, make or amend such general rules or orders as may be requisite for the order and regulation of proceedings before it or before any division of the commission—including forms of notice and the service thereof, which shall conform, as nearly as may be to those in use in the courts of the United States.

That is new—

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I think there is nothing in this bill that makes a decision as to the division of the commission final, is there?

Mr. ESCH. You can always apply to the commission for a reopening if you are dissatisfied with the ruling of a division, but in the granting of a petition for reopening under the present practice, the petitioner must show that there was some error of fact in the record, and I think that is absolutely necessary, if we are to help the commission expedite its work.

Mr. TOWNER. In the paragraph on page 11, I notice that the commission may make as many divisions as it chooses. Is there any idea, or can we have any definite idea from the committee, as to how many divisions it is contemplated shall be established in the United States?

Mr. ESCH. Do you mean divisions based territorially or do you mean divisions of the commission?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes; territorially.

Mr. ESCH. Oh, we do not take care of that. We do not consider that at all. That is a proposition, however, pending before the Newlands joint committee.

Mr. TOWNER. Yes; I understand that. The language is not very clear, it seems to me, as to indicating what the divisions may be. It says they may divide the members thereof into as many divisions as it may deem necessary. Then, again, in the last sentence in the same paragraph it says:

In case of vacancy in any division, or of absence or inability to serve thereon of any commissioner,

Thereby seeming to imply only one commissioner was to serve in each division. Now, does the bill in any place indicate the character of the divisions that are to be made, whether they are by the subject, as related by the gentleman, or whether they are by the division? I suppose the gentleman is familiar with the proposition to divide the United States into nine districts to correspond with the present circuit divisions of the United States?

Mr. ESCH. That is a proposition we did not consider in connection with this bill.

Mr. TOWNER. But this idea I wanted the gentleman to express his opinion upon. Ought not there to be some definite idea in the bill at some place as to what the character of the divisions are, whether by subjects to be assigned, whether by territory to be covered, or whether or not we may know in some definite way for consideration what the proposition really is?

Mr. ESCH. We felt that we could leave it to the discretion and good judgment of the commission.

Mr. TOWNER. Is it not in the power now, as this bill is drawn, to make a division of subjects, or division territorially, or make any other character of division the commission may choose to make?

Mr. ESCH. I do not think they contemplate at all making divisions based upon territory. The testimony before the Senate committee clearly indicates what they meant by division, and Commissioner Clark clearly indicated there would be a division for accounts, a division for the administration of the safety-appliance acts, a division on tariffs, and a division on the physical valuation of railroads. He indicated the scope of the proposed amendment.

Mr. TOWNER. I understand that. That might be in contemplation of one of the members of the commission, or perhaps all of them, but there is not anything to direct the commission as to how these divisions shall be made. And neither is there anything here that will allow us to consider the question. For instance, some of us might prefer territorial division, and some of us might object to the idea that one man might have assigned to him a particular class of subjects to consider. There is very grave objection to that, as the gentleman knows. It seems to me that we ought to have the right to consider the grounds on which the division is to be made by the commission.

Mr. ESCH. The gentleman will get some idea of the possible scope of the division work by the table that was published by the chairman of the committee on page 3588 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. That is the present classification. And I have no doubt if this bill becomes a law, and the work of divisions is authorized, they will very largely follow the schedule of division of work published on that page.

Mr. TOWNER. The commission might change its mind over night.

Mr. ESCH. That is true, but we have to have some confidence in it.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman think it means to provide by law that the commission should be permitted to organize a division which would constitute a minority in numbers of the entire board, and permit that division to hold a hearing and determine a matter, and its decision be final? Should there not be some provision whereby their findings could be reviewed by the entire board? If not, they might send out three members to hold a hearing on a very important matter, and they might render a decision which the other six members of the commission would clearly not look at in the same way.

Mr. ESCH. Unless the work of the commission can be done by subdivisions the addition of two commissioners will be of little or no avail.

Mr. WALSH. I did not mean to have the majority of the commission participate in the hearings, but to have some appellate or review provision in the bill.

Mr. ESCH. The chairman of the committee suggested, possibly in the absence of the gentleman, that he would offer an amendment to line 16, of page 12, in these words, "subject to revision when demanded by either party interested."

Mr. WALSH. Now, does the gentleman care to state whether, in his opinion, that would be a wise amendment?

Mr. ESCH. I think that where you permit the revision as the result of a demand you are not going to expedite the work of the commission, because any party aggrieved will demand a rehearing.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman know of any other commission or board or tribunal where a minority in numbers can exercise jurisdiction and their decision be final without any right of review?

Mr. ESCH. Its action, you know, is by a majority of the commission. It still acts by a majority, but of course it would not act by a majority of the whole commission unless there was reason for a reopening and it were presented to the full commission, when, of course, it would have to be determined by a majority of the full commission.

Mr. WALSH. But a majority of the division would be so much smaller than a majority of the entire commission.

Mr. ESCH. Yes. But that is one of the reasons that impelled the commission to seek this legislation at the hands of Congress.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. What would the gentleman think of an amendment like this: Here is a case where there is a dissenting opinion; for instance, a case where only two of the three agree on the position. Should it be appealed to the full commission?

Mr. ESCH. I think a party aggrieved by a decision, if he has one of these commissioners on his side, would see to it that a reopening was had.

Mr. GORDON. You think that would answer the purpose?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Yes; I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is not the phraseology of the bill broad enough to permit the commission to divide the country into territorial divisions, as suggested by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER]?

Mr. ESCH. I think not, because the bill will have to be interpreted as a whole, and I do not think that you can draw that conclusion from the language.

Mr. STAFFORD. Here is the authorization part:

The commission is hereby authorized by its order to divide the members thereof into as many divisions as it may deem necessary, which may be changed from time to time. Such divisions shall be denominated, respectively, division 1, division 2, etc.

There is nothing in the bill that controverts the idea that they can not establish such territorial divisions if they see fit.

Mr. ESCH. Personally I would have no objection to your limiting it so as not to include territorial divisions, but I know that is not the purpose and intent.

Mr. STAFFORD. When I read this bill two weeks ago I think it was intended to confer the power on the commission to divide the country into territorial divisions.

Mr. ESCH. If they were divided along territorial lines you would have to have from six to nine territorial groups, corresponding to the traffic territories, and then you would have all your commissioners out and have none here in Washington.

Mr. STAFFORD. There could be both territorial divisions and divisions arranged along the lines of administrative work. There could be all classes of divisions under this bill, so far as I can see.

Mr. ESCH. It is not that broad.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. The idea is prevalent to at least a considerable extent that territorial divisions are contemplated by this bill. I had a letter from a lawyer—a very able lawyer—strongly opposing the bill as it is now drawn on this ground, that if they divided into territorial divisions probably one commissioner would be assigned to each division, and there would be no adequate appeal to the whole court.

I have very great admiration, I will say, for the present commission and the way it is doing its work. I think it has done an extraordinary amount of work in a very able, high-minded, and conscientious way, and I have no criticism whatever to make upon the bill, because I think the gentleman has given it much more consideration than I have. But it does occur to me that in some more definite way the bill should point out the ground upon which divisions are to be made and the scope contemplated in a general way for the divisions to operate.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. I yield.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, by permission of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH], who has the floor, I will say that I think the people who have corresponded with the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] have confused this with the proceedings of the Newlands Committee. The railroads have proposed a very elaborate plan before that committee to revolutionize the entire system and divide the country into territorial districts and appoint commissioners in those different sections.

Mr. TOWNER. Well, that may be; but there is nothing in the bill to negative that.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is pending before the Newlands committee, and until that came out this bill, which has passed the House twice, never aroused such a suspicion as that.

Mr. TOWNER. That is likely to be true.

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman will read on in this section, over the next page, he will find that it is not contemplated to make any change in the jurisdiction or method of handling cases other than by the subdivisions of the entire commission, and that different men may be assigned to different divisions and that different cases may be assigned to different divisions at the pleasure of the commission. There is no suggestion anywhere in the bill, and none of us have ever heard of such a thing as a territorial division.

Mr. TOWNER. Well, there is nothing definite to show on what ground the division is to be made.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to take up so much time, because there are others who may want to speak on this bill. I believe that the bill as reported to the House should be modified so as to require only five members of the commission to sit and participate in decisions on all questions relating to and arising out of the physical valuation act. With a membership of nine on the commission, five members would still be a majority.

I wish to say a few words with reference to the amendment which has been offered for the information of the House, although not yet offered to the bill proper.

As I stated, this amendment is practically the same as the Smith amendment added to this bill in the Senate. It was a rider in the Senate. It had not had any previous consideration by the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce. It had not been referred to the Interstate Commerce Commission for a report. It was adopted on the floor of the Senate and was sent over to the House. The House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce did not incorporate the Smith amendment in the House bill which is now being considered as a substitute for the Senate bill.

Personally, I believe that it would be unwise to adopt that amendment at this time. The amendment simply makes it compulsory upon the commission to suspend a rate or a series of rates, or a body of rates, upon the protest of any person. The existing law leaves it to the discretion of the commission as to whether it will suspend a rate or permit it to become the legal rate to be charged. That is the difference between existing law and the amendment sought to be incorporated in the bill. What will it mean if the amendment becomes law? It will mean that the discretion now vested in the commission will be taken from it, and that any person, who need not be a party to the rate at all, by filing a protest with the commission, can deny the commission the exercise of any discretion, and compel the commission to suspend the rate and to hold the necessary hearing thereon.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman yield for a question there?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. Having heard the gentleman's statement, I want to call his attention to the proposed amendment which I have contemplated offering.

Mr. ESCH. Is it the amendment that was printed in the RECORD?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. ESCH. Unamended?

Mr. SIMS. The amendment which I propose to offer was printed in the RECORD of Wednesday last?

Mr. TOWNER. On what page?

Mr. SIMS. Page 3854. Now, I propose to amend that amendment so that it will read:

The commission on its own initiative may and upon complaint or protest shall—

Now, I propose to insert some new words after "protest," so that it will read:

And upon complaint or protest by any person, firm, corporation, or association which under this act would have the right to file an application for a change in the rate, fare, charge, classification or practice should it go into effect.

The amendment is an amendment to the act to regulate commerce, and that act provides who may protest.

Mr. ESCH. I will read to the gentleman a statement of those who can file protests. You will find it in the first part of section 13:

That any person, firm, corporation, company, or association, or any mercantile, agricultural, or manufacturing society or other organization, or any body politic or municipal organization, or any common carrier, complaining of anything done or omitted to be done by any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act, in contravention of the provisions thereof may apply to said commission by petition.

Well, that includes everybody—any person, firm, corporation——

Mr. SIMS. That is existing law.

Mr. ESCH. Body politic, agricultural society, common carrier. If you incorporate that language in your amendment you still make it possible that any person may, by filing a protest against these rates, suspend the rates and compel the commission to hold a hearing. You will clutter up the dockets of the Interstate Commerce Commission if your amendment becomes a law. With the overwhelming amount of work they now have to do, you will compel a hearing upon every application for an increase of rate when a protest is filed.

Mr. SIMS. That is existing law.

Mr. ESCH. Ah, but the commission now has the right to permit the rate to become effective without a formal hearing.

Mr. DEWALT. Does not the gentleman think that the words in the act itself are really broader than the words that the gentleman from Tennessee proposes?

Mr. ESCH. Yes; I think so.

Mr. DEWALT. Are they not more comprehensive?

Mr. ESCH. I think so.

Mr. DEWALT. The effect of the amendment by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] would really weaken the act instead of strengthening it, would it not?

Mr. ESCH. I think so.

Mr. SIMS. The amendment as presented did not have this language in it, but a gentleman called me on the telephone yesterday and said that the amendment as it now reads would seem to permit anybody, arbitrarily, captiously, or otherwise, to protest; and so, in consultation with others, I drew this addition to satisfy those who had an idea that anyone might captiously suspend a rate; but the act itself, I think, is stronger than it is with the amendment.

Mr. DEWALT. I think it is stronger than the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. SIMS. And I shall not offer the amendment if the criticism is not made that it is too broad.

Mr. ESCH. In order to appreciate the force of that objection, I call your attention to the fact that during the year 1916 there were filed 107,057 tariffs, and many of those included hundreds of individual rates. Under the proposed amendment anybody feeling himself aggrieved can make protest to the commission, compel a suspension of the rate, and force a hearing, notwithstanding the fact that the commission, as a result of the evidence it has in its records, and as a result of prior decisions of similar cases, might almost offhand determine that that rate should be allowed, and thus save the commission a tremendous amount of work. Why, in the last year the commission granted suspensions in 222 cases, but denied suspensions in 295 cases. But under this amendment every one of these would have to be suspended upon the protest of any individual, even though the person protesting was not a party to the rate.

If this amendment becomes a law, there will be many claim attorneys around this town seeking an opportunity, the moment an increase of rates is filed, to file a protest and to start a formal proceeding, with hearing, testimony, brief, and argument, and the whole array of procedure before the commission. If you think that that is going to relieve the commission of its work, you will be deceived.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman has described this as the Smith amendment. The Smith family is a large one, and will the gentleman kindly designate which Smith it was, so that the other Smiths who may not want to bear the paternity of it will be relieved?

Mr. ESCH. It was Senator HOKE SMITH of Georgia. Then, there is another objection which I have. Under the present law the commission can suspend the rate for 120 days after the rate would otherwise become effective, to wit, 30 days after filing. If during the 120 days the commission, by pressure of work, can not finish the hearings, it can further extend the suspension for an additional six months. So, under existing law, the total suspension is 10 months.

Under the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee there is no limit to the period of suspension—it can go on endlessly. There is a clause in the amendment which says that preference shall be given to these rate-suspension cases, and decisions shall be handed down as speedily as possible. That means nothing if you overload the commission with work. You would throw into a dangerous situation the freight business of the country if the rate should have to be suspended for an indefinite period of time. Under the existing law there is a definite and specific period within which there shall be a suspension.

Another thing the proposed amendment requires before the commission could make the final determination—it would have to determine to its own satisfaction three things: First, that the rates were not unjust and unreasonable; second, that they were not unduly preferential or prejudicial; and third, that they were not in contravention of any of the provisions of the interstate-commerce act. It would have to be satisfied as to all three of these factors in determining the case before it would reach a decision. That is the scope of the amendment.

Now, when you have bodies of rates presented to the commission as are presented in the 15 per cent cases, bodies of rates embodying thousands of individual tariffs, covering vast sections of the country, the commission, before it could decide as to the rates suspended under this amendment, would have to satisfy itself that all the rates were fair, that the charges were just and reasonable, and, second, were not unduly preferential or prejudicial, and third, that they were not in contravention of the interstate-commerce act. It is not possible that that can be done.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. Does the gentleman mean to state that on a proposition to raise the rates 15 per cent they ought to do it without a sufficient hearing?

Mr. ESCH. I say that they have had sufficient hearings. For 30 days the full commission has been sitting on the 15 per cent cases; not only the commissioners, but examiners, have been hearing surplus witnesses that they themselves could not hear. Every person who had an application, who wanted to be heard, has been heard by the commission.

Mr. SIMS. A large part of that time on the side of the protestants was taken to induce the commissioners to have a hearing that would give them and the country an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. ESCH. Does the gentleman know that it is going to be denied them?

Mr. SIMS. I do not know; but what harm is it to make it mandatory in the statute? Thirty days is an insignificant time to be consumed in the matter of advance of freight rates 15 per cent after we have had a 5 per cent advance, and especially when the railroads have been making great profits.

Mr. ESCH. Will the gentleman talk in his own time?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman states that this amendment would enable any individual in the United States, whether he had any interest in the matter or not, merely by filing a complaint to automatically suspend rates?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. What would be the effect if some individual in California should file a complaint attacking some eastern railroad rates?

Mr. ESCH. There would be endless delay and confusion. My theory is that if this amendment be adopted, even though it be just in theory but impracticable in practice, you would so overload the commission that the whole structure of rate regulation would fall to the ground. Gentlemen, we must come to the relief of this commission. We must grant additional members. If this amendment is carried two additional members will not do the business, and I doubt whether a score of additional commissioners could do the work that would be thrown on the commission by reason of this added burden.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. With the increased number of commissioners sought to be provided for in the bill, does the gentleman believe that we ought to divide them into groups and authorize these groups to fix the rates?

Mr. ESCH. I believe that is the only practicable way to furnish any relief and permit rate regulations to maintain itself.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman think that anything less than the whole commission should pass on railroad rates?

Mr. ESCH. I think it would be impossible for the whole commission to pass upon all these cases.

Mr. MADDEN. If the groups were to report to the full commission, would not that be the better way?

Mr. ESCH. It might, but if any party feels aggrieved over the decision he can appeal or petition for a reopening and get the views of the whole commission.

Mr. MADDEN. But that would result in litigation, which ought not to be encouraged.

Mr. ESCH. There is an amendment to be proposed by the gentleman from Georgia that would cover the point the gentleman has in mind.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON. The amendment does not involve the formality of reopening the case. It is when either party wants the opinion of the full commission.

Mr. ESCH. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. THOMPSON). The gentleman has 20 minutes remaining.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to discuss the entire scope of the bill, because that has been well discussed by the chairman of the committee and also by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH]. My discussion will be confined to the amendment which I propose to offer, which was offered by me when this bill was up for consideration before. Briefly stated, it is to make it mandatory upon the commission, whenever protest or complaint is made, that the commission shall hear that protest or complaint and shall suspend the rate complained of and protested against until there has been a hearing; and it applies with great force to the present proposition to add a 15 per cent rate increase—a horizontal flat increase, I believe—with the exception of some commodities, like coal and things of that kind, over practically the entire country, without a sufficient hearing.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Has the gentleman any idea of the number of complaints which are filed annually before the commission and of the length of time which it would take, in the most expeditious way, to hear and dispose of those complaints?

Mr. SIMS. Let me ask the gentleman this: Does the gentleman suppose that the present commission as now formed under the present law has ever yet refused to suspend a rate, where there was a real complaint against it, in order to have a hearing?

Mr. DEMPSEY. That is not what I understand——

Mr. SIMS. I want the gentleman to tell me whether or not it is operating that way now. Is it now refusing because it has no time to hear on account of the number of protests filed?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I should think that they would have to refuse hearings except where they believed the complaint to be well founded and such as to justify hearing and determination. If all of the lawsuits which are brought in the country—and that is practically what this is, were brought to trial, this commission would have to devote its times to trying lawsuits.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, of course there are a great many rates filed against which there is no protest, and there will be none in the future. Men do not make protests against rates for merely captious reasons. The question of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] whether some individual in California protests against putting into effect a rate on the Atlantic coast is illustrative. No such thing is contemplated, but the law which we are now amending points out who may make protests, and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] read that portion of the law. It is now exceedingly liberal, and if the commission has not got time to consider protests and give hearings on those protests before putting the rate in, the commission is a failure. I do not mean a personal failure; but the argument has been made that the protests will be so numerous that it will be impossible to hear them, and two more commissioners will not make it possible when these protests run into the hundreds of thousands, as gentlemen claim.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is the reason I had in mind in making the inquiry. Under the gentleman's amendment an individual anywhere in the country could file a protest, and that automatically would cause delay in the adjustment of rates.

Mr. SIMS. One individual. The laws prescribe what individuals, companies, and corporations may make these protests, and that has been the law all the time; and I am insisting that under the law as it now is and as it has been administered hundreds of rates have been put into effect for lack of protest, no protest or complaint being made against them, and that will be the way in the future. Shippers as a rule do not protest unless they think it is just and that the protest ought to be made. Individuals living around all over the country who have no interest are protesting against these rates. They have other things to entertain them besides that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think the gentleman himself has often protested on the floor against too much power being given to one individual to drag other individuals all over the country in order to answer complaints before the Interstate Commerce Commission or before the courts.

Mr. SIMS. The present law authorizes the railroads to make all of their rates and only requires that they shall file them 30 days before the time they go into effect. The present law gives the commission the right of its own motion to suspend the proposed rates during the 30 days, and the present law gives them the right to suspend upon protest and complaint. It is in the general law. We have piled on to the Interstate Commerce Commission a vast amount of duties which do not relate to the making of rates, and the disposition has been to unload everything almost on the commission, and why? Because it has made such a character and reputation in the country for efficient public service in the interest of the public that the public wants them to go where they think they are going to get relief.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman think it would relieve the Interstate Commerce Commission and enable them to do the necessary work Congress has hitherto imposed upon them if we were to take away from them now the physical valuation of the railroads of the country?

Mr. SIMS. As the gentleman knows, that valuation work is going on under the direction of the commission, but it is under a director, and not taking up the time of the commission.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman contend that it does not take the minds of the commissioners away from their other work?

Mr. SIMS. When the case is brought before them, when it is being considered by them, yes, but that is a last year's bird's nest.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I know, but it would be possible under this bill to relieve them of the work of physical valuation of the railroads.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, with the permission of the gentleman from Tennessee, I would suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the valuation work probably will be entirely suspended during the war, because of the uncertain values. It is impossible to arrive at any permanent value.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I was going to raise that very question, and so long as the gentleman from Georgia has raised it, with the permission of the gentleman from Tennessee, I would like to ask whether the committee has considered the propriety of relieving the commission of the physical valuation of railroads at the present time?

Mr. ADAMSON. We have considered it is not necessary to do so because it will operate anyway.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Congress continues to appropriate money for that purpose.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not think the gentleman will find Congress continuing to do so during the war.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The country needs the engineers and the trained men who are in this service now for war service.

Mr. ADAMSON. My understanding is that is where they are going to be used, and it is not necessary for us to take any action.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I had proposed by reason of complaints made that this amendment was too broad, to amend by providing who should have the right to protest which was, by any person, firm, corporation, or association which under this act—that is the act to regulate interstate commerce—have the right to file an application for a change in a rate, fare, charge, classification or practice which is put into effect. Now, that amendment would certainly get away from this scarecrow that there are going to be men all over the country to protest against a change of a rate whether there is anything in it or not in which they are interested, but, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania said, the effect seems to be rather to restrict the present law, to limit it, than to broaden it. It would make it absolutely sure that nobody could make a protest or complaint who does not under the law have the right to complain of an existing rate after it is put into effect. Now, I want to say, this is a bill chiefly to increase the membership of the Interstate Commerce Commission, to make it consist of nine members instead of seven, so as to divide it up and permit it to sit in various parts of the country. The commission is not any part of the executive departments of this Government. It does not report to nor is it under the control of any Cabinet officer or any head of any department. It is an arm of Congress, created by Congress to do that which Congress does not have the time to do for itself, and within limits, rules, and regulations which are laid down by Congress they are to execute and carry them out within those limitations, and we have a right to say in the interest of the 100,000,000 of people that rates shall not be radically increased at a time when it is unquestioned, undisputed, and undenied that the railroads of this country are getting greater gross returns and greater net, than ever before in the history of this country. [Applause.]

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. I do.

Mr. MEEKER. That being true, would it not be better for Congress to appoint the commissioners rather than turn it over to the Executive.

Mr. SIMS. Oh, there might be a lot of things Congress could do as well as the Executive, but the best thing for Congress to do is to do its part. Now here is an opportunity to do your part——

Mr. MEEKER. I am going to vote for the bill.

Mr. SIMS. Let this amendment go into this bill, so that those having the right to protest or complain shall have their protests or complaints heard before the rate goes into effect, and then you, through this arm of Congress, the commission, will be doing that which your constituents have a right to demand of you and for which there is a demand as wide as this country.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. I do.

Mr. WALSH. What is the necessity for increasing the salary?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. Does the gentleman desire more time?

Mr. SIMS. Five minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. I yield the gentleman five minutes additional.

Mr. SIMS. I do not know that there is any necessity for it. There is no doubt the duties of the commission have greatly increased with the increased work of the commission, and I do not object to those who work faithfully being well paid for it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. I will.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. If the United States Government goes more and more into the use of commissions, calling them arms of Congress, and increases the number of commissioners and pays them salaries in excess of what Members of the House and Senate get, is it not almost certain that you will make the arm stronger than the body itself?

Mr. SIMS. I do not think so, if we are careful about the laws we pass. Adopt this amendment.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. I will.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the filing of this protest which has to be heard mean that it can be employed as a means of obstructing a legitimate rate raise for some time perhaps?

Mr. SIMS. I certainly think not. That great body is not going to yield itself to the vagaries of evil-minded persons.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I did not mean to imply that; but might not the mechanics of the law be used by evil-minded persons outside as a means of delaying and obstructing?

Mr. SIMS. It is the existing law now, with the exception it is not made mandatory.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I understand; and that is the very point.

Mr. SIMS. There is this great rate increase now pending and probably the commission will suspend it or suspend it in part, but when a gentleman comes before this House, and especially a gentleman of the ability, knowledge, and experience of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH], who believes that it is possible for the commission in 30 days to know whether this 15 per cent rate increase should go into effect without further hearings, if that does not require of the commission a practical impossibility, I do not know what would. The hearing that has been had has been a plea for a real hearing, a real investigation, and I want to say if that rate increase goes in that has been asked by the railroads without such an investigation, that there will be a clamor to abolish the Interstate Commerce Commission instead of increasing it. [Applause.]

And whenever a protest has been made, as in this case, and when it is proposed to pile 15 per cent on every pound of freight that is shipped, let it be food, clothing, or what not, without a hearing further than a mere preliminiary hearing, you will hear of a storm in this country such as you have not heard in a long time. Pass this amendment which I am offering, and then the protestants will get an opportunity, if it becomes a law before the 1st day of July, to present their case.

The existing law provides that a rate may be suspended for 120 days by the commission or upon complaint or protest. There may be cases where there ought to be 120 days' suspension. Can you imagine a case where it can be better used than where there is a bald, bold demand to put a 15 per cent horizontal, flat-rate increase on the entire commerce of this country, at a time when if it were possible every vital food product ought to be carried free instead of being taxed 15 per cent over present rates?

In 1914 they got a 5 per cent rate in the eastern classification territory and a higher rate west of the Mississippi and in the South. If we are going to try to make up for the deficiencies in the operation of the railroads of this country by simply piling on increases of rate every time they say they need it, it is only a question of time when it will be practically impossible to move coal in this country from one section to another at a rate that can be made practicable to use it.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman pardon another interruption?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I do not understand, after all, that the real crux of this matter is whether it shall be 30 days or 120 days of suspension. The question is whether the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be compelled under a mandatory law to suspend anyway. If it is optional with them, the matter of time cuts no figure. If it is mandatory, then that law can be used as an obstruction to any rate increase.

Mr. SIMS. There is no probability of such a thing happening, because the present law can be so used.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is difficult to get the gentleman's amendment, which was printed some time ago, but does not that amendment provide in effect that upon the complaint of anyone as to rates there shall be an automatic suspension of rates?

Mr. SIMS. Upon the complaint made by those authorized under existing law to make complaint.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does not that mean any person?

Mr. SIMS. It meant what the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] read. That is the present law. The only question in this whole controversy is whether it shall be mandatory to suspend a rate.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There is a rate case now pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission, and a decision is expected very soon——

Mr. SIMS. It ends the 1st of July.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would it not be possible under the gentleman's amendment for any individual to file a protest against that finding of the commission when it comes, and then automatically suspend the action of the commission? Would it not be possible?

Mr. SIMS. We want to make it mandatory, because it will cover the present pending rate-increase case now before the commission. That is an immediate pressing demand.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then there is danger that a designing person, if you please, a blackmailer, could file a protest, and, being unknown to the commission, would automatically hold up the entire country?

Mr. SIMS. That is why I said that I proposed an amendment here which made it impossible for any such thing to be done. Now, gentlemen, you can take the responsibility, if you want to do so. I do not know whether the commission is going to suspend or not suspend in that case, but I know there are people in this country that think they have not had an opportunity to present their case.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman refers to the existing law and suggests that we can find out there who can file the complaint. The law has been handed to me, and I read that any person, firm, corporation, or company, or association, or any mercantile, agricultural, or manufacturing society, or any organization may file a complaint. That means that a man in California can hold up the rates affecting the entire Atlantic seaboard, or a man in Pennsylvania can hold up the rates west of the Rocky Mountains.

Mr. SIMS. By any person, firm, of association which under the act would have the right to file an application for a change in the rate, fare, charge, or classification. That limits it to those who have the right to make the protest after it goes into effect.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But the gentleman's amendment justifies a single complaint and holds up the proceedings meanwhile.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. That would be only chasing one another around in a circle.

Mr. SIMS. This amendment confines it to persons in making the protest who would have a right to make the complaint after it became a rate.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. What does it matter what their present legal estate is? I hope the gentleman will pardon me for consuming his time; I hope it is to some purpose. The question, as I understand it, is whether or not this thing shall be optional, so that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall use discretion as to whether this protest is made in good faith, or whether it is mandatory; and if it is mandatory, then the matter of the bona fides of the protest or complaint does not enter into it at all.

Mr. SIMS. I think the general law requires that those who protest must have an interest in the rate.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. But the interest may not be a fair one.

Mr. SIMS. It is bound to be or it would not be protected by this law.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The law presumes that anybody making a protest is fair about it until shown to be unfair.

Mr. GILLETT. Any shipper could do it.

Mr. SIMS. Yes; they have the right to make complaint. Such action must come within 30 days, but the commission can limit the time of the suspension as it may be made to appear to them as necessary and proper and right, so that it would not be one of these so-called captious cases, even if one were made prima facie.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is not required to suspend it?

Mr. SIMS. Not for a specified time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I suggest to the gentleman that he is giving great latitude to those who might have a designing purpose.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. And they might accomplish the purpose in one day.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. In such a case as that supposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] would there be any such danger of wrong being done to shippers of this country as there would be in legislation giving to railroad managers the power to base the rate?

Mr. SIMS. And without a hearing.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, we passed a bill eight or nine years ago in this House to increase the membership of the Interstate Commerce Commission from seven to nine members, for the reason that the business was accumulating so rapidly that that commission was overburdened and could not with sufficient alacrity and dispatch attend to the business of the country. That bill failed in the Senate. Two years ago we passed a bill almost identical in terms with the substitute now reported from the committee to the House. It went to the Senate and failed of passage. This year we introduced and the committee reported the same bill, but we sent a copy of it to the Senate, and the Senate committee reported it.

So this is the third time that the bill has come before this House in identical terms, with the exception of the subdivision of the commission in the bill the last two times. We endeavored to make as few changes as possible in the existing law. Our single purpose was to provide for the relief of the commission and the dispatch of business. Therefore we did not change the term or the salaries of the commission, or any of the rules or methods of practice, but merely provided that when increased to nine members the commission could be subdivided into three or more divisions and changed from time to time.

That bill, when it reached the Senate, received an important amendment. Under the present law, which has been on the books for some time, the commission has the discretion to make a suspension of rates when they are filed. Bear in mind that for 10 years after the decision of the Supreme Court which we thought emasculated the commission we worked to give the commission power to control rates. We finally succeeded in 1906 in giving to them the undoubted power which had been recognized by the courts. We reviewed and revised this interstate-commerce law twice—once in 1906 and once in 1910.

In both cases before the committee a strenuous fight was made to put on what in substance is now known as the Smith and Sims amendment. The committee—and Congress in both branches sustained the committee—held that the discretion of the commission ought not to be trammeled; that, if Congress was going to invest the commission with power to make rates, it ought to give them discretion and allow and require them to control the question; so that the committee refused—and on two occasions Congress affirmed their action—to make mandatory upon the commission the suspension of rates every time anybody requested it.

Now, the chief issue here presented to-day by the Smith-Sims amendment is, Shall Congress permit the commission to continue to exercise its discretion as to suspending rates, or will Congress take that out of their hands and make it mandatory?

Well, we are in the face of a great crisis, some people say. I do not want to get excited about these things. It is true a general proposition to make a general raise of 15 per cent is the most startling movement ever made before the commission, and it does seem that, if any proposition ought to be suspended, that ought; and it does seem, in view of our provision in the law to permit four months and then six months additional for hearings on the complete suspension of rates, that proposition ought to suggest that 30 days' preliminary investigation is not sufficient investigation on a proposition for the greatest increase ever offered in the country.

But there is another side to it. While I believe that the commission will suffer before Congress and before the country if it permits these rates to go into operation without suspension and investigation, I believe it would be a much more severe blow to the commission for Congress to anticipate adverse action in advance and strike them this legislative blow. I do not know that the commission is going to suspend the rates. This proposition in the Senate was made at the outset of a preliminary investigation by the commission as to whether or not they would suspend the rates. They have sat there for 30 days, constantly working—and killed one of the commissioners at work—trying to decide, and they are sitting now daily all day considering the evidence that they heard for 30 days to decide whether they will suspend the rates or not.

I have never doubted that they will suspend the rates. I have never doubted that they will find that there ought to be a longer period for hearing so important a case.

The matter came up in the Senate, and it occurred to some Senators that there was danger that the commission might not suspend the advanced rate, and in apprehension thereof that it was necessary to pass a law taking the discretion out of their hands. Well, sometimes it is right to be an alarmist, and I want to say for the distinguished gentleman representing Georgia in the Senate, of whom some slighting remark was made by some gentleman on the floor just now, that while I have known a great many Smiths in my life, I do not know any Smith equal to that man in ability or superior to him in character, and no other Smith need blush to be confused with him. I do not agree with him in all things. Great men make great mistakes, and the greater the man the greater the contrast appears between him and a false act if he makes a mistake, and therefore the mistakes of great men look larger than the mistakes of small men. Whether this is a mistake I will not say. It may be overzeal. I do not think it was necessary. I do not believe—and the committee of which I am a member agree with me—we do not believe it necessary in advance of action to say that we will change the law through fear that the commission will not suspend the rates. Now, I will tell you what our committee thought about this thing. Our committee thought that while this commission, created by us and charged with this duty, is engaged in considering the very proposition of suspending this 15 per cent increase, we ought not to trammel and embarrass the commission by legislating about the very act that we have charged them with the consideration of, but that we ought to pass the bill exactly as the House has passed it three times, if I remember correctly, and then in conference decide whether or not we could agree with the Senate, and confer with the commission as to what was right and proper to be done. I am free to say that the conference can not possibly conclude before Saturday night, and if the commission should be derelict in its duty and should fail to suspend these rates I do not hesitate to say that I will be willing, and the committee has so said in the report, to make some provision in conference to prevent an unjust increase in rates. The committee thought, and so reported, that the matter would be properly handled as they recommended.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The gentleman is chairman of a very important committee.

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Let me suppose for a moment that each Member of the House of Representatives should rise in his place and make a statement similar to that which the gentleman has just made. What would be the probable effect of such a statement on the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. ADAMSON. What is the gentleman's question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The gentleman proposed that if the Interstate Commerce Commission does not do so and so in regard to the proposed increase in freight rates he might accede to some legislation in conference that would punish them.

Mr. ADAMSON. I hope there will be no misunderstanding of my statement. My statement is that the conference will be in session probably until the end of the consideration by the commission, and that, if Judge SIMS is right, and if the Senate is right, something ought to be done. The matter will still be open for consideration, and we can determine it; and, as to the conference committee, I will say to the gentleman that the conferees who are members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce never do anything without consulting the House and obtaining the approval of the House.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I know that quite well.

Mr. GORDON. Is there not a law at present in existence that provides in substance that in all applications for increase of rate the existing rate shall be prima facie presumed to be just and reasonable?

Mr. ADAMSON. That is true; and in all cases of this kind, in investigations of proposed increases, the burden is on the party proposing the increase. The burden is on the party proposing the change in rate.

Mr. GORDON. Exactly.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is the existing law. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to be fair and right in this thing. I have great respect for law and great respect for courts and great respect for the tribunals that we have created.

Is it right, before the commission has rendered its decision, which it is now considering with a view to announcing it this week, having only three more days—is it right to anticipate and apprehend that the commission is going to do something contrary to our views and pass a law in advance to control the commission? It would be little short of impeachment in advance of action, and I repeat respectfully that in the meantime, should it appear necessary to agree to anything touching this subject, there would be ample time then to do it, and we can then come back to either House with any action of the conference committee, and we can make any act of Congress take effect from the date of its approval as to rates, if we see proper to do so. But I insist that we ought now to pass this bill as the House has previously passed it.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. ADAMSON. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. I am asking purely for information. In this investigation that is being made by the commission you anticipate a decision?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. You anticipate that it may be a 15 per cent advance?

Mr. ADAMSON. No, sir; I believe it will be a suspension.

Mr. CANNON. The commission have power to do either.

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. That is, they have the power to suspend their decision for further investigation. How long have they been investigating?

Mr. ADAMSON. They have worked 30 days unceasingly, and part of the time have had two or three examiners outside hearing overflow witnesses.

Mr. CANNON. And now the gentleman's information is that they are going to decide it in two or three days; and his proposition is to wait, giving notice in the meantime that if they do not decide it our way we will hold them up?

Mr. ADAMSON. No; I say it is not necessary for us to act now, for several reasons, one of which is that we can not take final action until after they do, and then if people insist on action we will have a chance to take it if we want to.

Mr. CANNON. That is to say, if this commission that Congress created does not please us by its action concerning an increase of rates or a decrease of rates, as the case may be, we will give notice that we propose to nullify the whole thing by legislation.

Mr. ADAMSON. We still have jurisdiction in this bill, because the conferees can not report before that time.

Mr. CANNON. But I am speaking generally. We have created a commission and propose to give them notice that they must satisfy Congress or we will either put them out of office or nullify their action. Does not the gentleman think we had better repeal the law and let Congress fix the rates?

Mr. ADAMSON. I am not going to notify them of anything, but I am telling my colleagues that it is unnecessary in advance of their action to assume they are going to do wrong and change the law. I want to say to the gentleman from Tennessee that we still have the bill under our control after they have decided it.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. As I understand the gentleman's position it is to this effect: That if the commission permits the rates to go into effect now it would be an unsound exercise of their discretion and discredit the commission with Congress.

Mr. ADAMSON. No; I beg my friend's pardon, I have not said that. I say that after they act, whether it be one way or the other, if my friend from Tennessee still desires to legislate, the bill will be before Congress for final action.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Does the gentleman think it would be a sound exercise of their discretion to allow the rates to go into effect without further hearings?

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not; I think they ought to suspend the rates, and I believe they will.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. But suppose that they do not, this debate would lead them to infer that Congress might step in and take a hand.

Mr. ADAMSON. It could, but whether it will or not I do not know.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It is serving such notice on the commission.

Mr. ADAMSON. No; they know as well as we do that Congress could pass a law if it wanted to. I have stated what I thought about it.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. I will.

Mr. BORLAND. Has not the gentleman stated repeatedly that he did not intend to report any bill that was not a war emergency? What is the war emergency contained in this bill?

Mr. ADAMSON. This was the first bill proposed in the President's program.

Mr. BORLAND. What war emergency is there in this? The committee on transportation of the Council of National Defense is engaged in the regulation of the traffic of railroads.

Mr. ADAMSON. I will refer the gentleman to the President.

Mr. BORLAND. This specific bill was in the President's program?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. That is the gentleman's justification for bringing it in?

Mr. ADAMSON. That is my answer; I do not need any justification. It is in line with the preparedness of the President's war program.

Mr. BORLAND. But the gentleman himself does not say that it is a war measure.

Mr. ADAMSON. The President asked Congress to come together in special session for a specific purpose, and this bill has been mentioned every time.

Mr. WALSH. Has not the gentleman from Missouri had a letter from the President on this matter?

Mr. BORLAND. No; not on this matter. When I do I will see that the gentleman from Massachusetts has notice of it.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman one more question for information.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman has complimented me so much by saying that I could give him information that I gladly yield.

Mr. CANNON. How long have the freight rates been substantially as they are now?

Mr. ADAMSON. That is a hard question to answer, because they are raised in different ways all along the line by changing classifications and otherwise. The greatest general raise was the 5 per cent raise last year.

Mr. CANNON. Can the gentleman inform me how much rise there has been in proportion of the railways from the standpoint of cars, wages, maintenance, and so on. There is an impression, and I must confess without being very well informed that the railways on the average in this country are in a pretty bad way, that many of them a few months ago were in a condition where people who ride on them felt that it was not very safe, because they were not in good condition; that they were not earning enough to enable them to maintain them in good condition.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman is propounding a large question and proposes to go into the very thing before the commission. If I should answer that question, I should say that it is said that many hundred thousand have been put into a propaganda to make the people believe just what the gentleman's question states, and that the whole thing is a bubble and will be punctured before the hearing is over. The rates were high enough for the present prices before the present prices were increased. They have been more profitable in the last 12 months than ever before in their history, and in February, when the railroads started to urge this upon the people through the commission, February had been sort of a poor month, but unfortunately for their case the business picked up in March and April and has been profitable ever since, and they are as prosperous as ever. Roads that do 80 per cent of the business of the country have plethoric treasuries. [Applause.]

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY].

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, the Sims amendment proposes two things. The first proposition is that anyone can prefer a complaint to the commission, and the commission, exercising no discretion of its own, not being allowed to decide whether or not that complaint is well founded, whether it has any basis whatever, is required to try that as elaborately as if it were a good complaint. There are two reasons why that should not be done, as it seems to me: First, we appoint the Interstate Commerce Commission, and we all regard it as a great body. The country has come to look to it with confidence as being able and honest and fearless, adequate in its functions to determine the great questions which have been confided to it, and by this amendment we absolutely rob that commission of any discretion whatever and make it the creature of the statute, required to do a thing whether there is the slightest sense in doing it or not. I do not believe, nor do I believe the committee would agree, that a commission clothed with such great powers, occupying such a dignified position, should be robbed of all discretion and required to try every issue that is presented to it.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Suppose this amendment provided that the commission should not raise any rate above the existing rate without a hearing. Does the gentleman think that would be infringing upon the jurisdiction of the commission?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I do not think it would; but I do think that is a very different proposition.

Mr. GORDON. That is the law now.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I do not say whether that is the law or not, but I do say that it is essentially different and does not present the same question at all. I do say that increases of rates are vital, very serious, questions.

Mr. GORDON. And it ought to be fully considered upon the evidence.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Does the gentleman think that question can be fully considered in 30 days?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I say that a great many increases of rates could be properly and adequately considered and determined in three days. I do not say whether a specific question could be determined in 3 days, in 30 days, or in 300 days. The gentleman puts me a general question, and I must give him a general answer. It is impossible to answer a specific question without the evidence as to that question.

Mr. GORDON. The gentleman is familiar with the law that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] just referred to?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. That prima facie existing rates are reasonable and just?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. GORDON. I beg the gentleman's pardon for taking up so much of his time.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT].

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, I have some regard for the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], but in order that we may clearly understand the matter now before us, let us put concretely just what he desires. The whole gist of his amendment lies in the word "shall." In other words, he makes it compulsory and mandatory upon the Interstate Commerce Commission to have these investigations and hearings upon the request of anyone who may make a complaint.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Suppose a shipper from one point on a line, we will say from Philadelphia, had had the question determined, and suppose the man at the next station wanted it determined, would he not have the right and could he not compel the commission, although the evidence had been presented, and the question absolutely determined in the first trial, to have a retrial and have it entirely determined the second time?

Mr. DEWALT. The original act does not go quite so far as that.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I am talking about the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

Mr. DEWALT. Oh, the amendment as he proposes it; yes. I thought the gentleman meant the powers that now exist.

Mr. DEMPSEY. No; I refer to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

Mr. DEWALT. Permit me to continue the argument for a moment, and I shall try to show the members of this committee how very drastic and how very futile at the same time this amendment would be. The present law is found to be as follows:

> That any person, firm, corporation, company, or association, or any mercantile, agricultural, or manufacturing society or other organization, or any body politic or municipality, organization, or any common carrier complaining of anything done or omitted to be done by any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act, in contravention to the provisions thereof, may apply to the said commission.

Then the act goes on to say that thereupon the Interstate Commerce Commission may—not shall—go on with this investigation, and, after hearing, shall determine the facts, and then, if that be not satisfactory, a rehearing can be had. The gist of the Sims amendment is simply this, that you place upon the Interstate Commerce Commission the shackle of a mandatory order that they must at any time, upon the complaint of anyone, at any place, upon any subject, in regard to the raising or lowering of rates upon common carriers, make an investigation. The result of that would be simply this: The Interstate Commerce Commission now consists of seven people, as we all know. They have asked for two additional members. There have been hundreds of cases presented before them, and some of them are now pending, and if this course of proceeding is to be completed according to the Sims amendment there will be no end to such hearings, and the wheels of progress in regard to the matter would of necessity be stopped.

Let me say but one word more, Mr. Chairman, and then I have concluded. My friend from Tennessee was very laudatory in regard to the ability and probity of the Interstate Commerce Commission. There is not a man anywhere, who has any business, there is not a man in the House of Representatives who knows anything of their procedure, but is willing to concede that as an established fact. If, then, my friend concurs in that opinion, which is prevalent all over the country and established by their course of conduct for so many years, why could not my friend from Tennessee leave the discretion with that body, which has the confidence of the people, instead of impeding legislation and impeding progress by hampering them in their efforts? [Applause.]

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WINSLOW].

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, this question came before the committee as a proposition to make more effective and more prompt the work of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and as a result the committee reported the bill now under discussion, which provided for the increase of membership of the commission by two and for a subdivision of their work. Such are the principal features of the bill, and virtually the only items being discussed, with the exception of the amendment and the amendment to the amendment proposed by Mr. SIMS.

There appears to be no doubt whatever as to the advisability of increasing the commission, and there has been but little, if any, objection to the idea of the subdivision of work. Both propositions are calculated to make possible a quicker completion of the undertakings which the commission is called upon to consider. Everybody knows that the members of the commission are overworked, that their conclusions are too slow for the public interests and for the convenience of those who have hearings before them. If an increase of the number of commissioners by two and an authorized subdivision of work can insure earlier decisions, it would seem to me best to encourage legislation in this direction and pass this bill. When we come, however, to the consideration of the Sims amendment, I think we come to a real stumbling block, and we have to face the trouble that is before this committee. Under existing law the commission can determine whether or not they want to yield to protests and have hearings.

As proposed by Mr. SIMS the commissioners must have hearings whether they approve or not at the request of people or organizations enumerated in the act, but the enumeration of those people and organizations seems to take in about anybody and everybody one can think of, so that by the time the amendment to the amendment and the original amendment might be adopted we would find ourselves back to the point where perhaps there would be virtually nobody, whether interested or otherwise, who could not file a protest against a rate upon which the commission must forthwith grant a hearing. The man who has much to do with business and who is considering methods other than dilatory knows perfectly well that the undertakings which would be forced upon the commissioners if they were obliged to have a hearing at the behest of anybody and everybody would be far in excess of anything they could accomplish with even a membership of nine. So I think it all gets down to a business consideration. Have we confidence in the commission; do we believe they are doing their work as fast as they could; do we want it done quicker; do we want to help them out or do we want to retard them? If we want to help them out, we must adopt some measures to lessen the work individually and increase the results of the commission. If on the other hand we want to retard their undertakings and put them further behind than ever, we have a chance to do that by letting any objector who thinks he has a grievance or an excuse force a hearing from the commission, contrary to their judgment or otherwise, and so on indefinitely. Under the present law 10 months represents the end of the time during which a protest can be argued. Under the Sims amendment, if it is passed, a hearing can go on indefinitely. I am sure this country at this time wants all of its organizations and departments conducted in such a way as to facilitate and expedite the business of the country, and I hope that there will be no technicalities of any kind which will hold back the legislation which this commission needs and for which the committee practically unanimously asked. [Applause.]

[Mr. JOHNSON of Washington addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield six minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM].

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I do not know the relevancy of the argument just closed with relation to the bill and the amendment, and therefore I shall not make any comment upon private cars or upon extra food——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. For a question.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I did not intend that to be an argument, but two weeks ago, when this bill seemed to be going through on a greased track, I thought that during its consideration would be a good time to look into and discuss the valuation of railroads. I desired an hour; I got two minutes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I do wish, however, while not answering that argument, which has now been withdrawn, to say a word or two in relation to the report and the amendment.

I wish to support the report of the committee, and I would oppose the amendment of the member of the committee which has been the chief point of discussion in the debate here. It seems to me that there is occasion for an enlargement of the force of this Interstate Commerce Commission. They are indeed taxed to the uttermost in doing the great work which has been placed upon them of regulating the transportation of this great country. The railroads of the country have submitted to and appreciate the work of this commission, and we have in operation, therefore, to-day a very successful method of regulation, which ought to be the chief end and aim of legislation upon this subject. In order, therefore, that the regulation may be more thoroughly carried out, let us increase the efficiency of the commission by increasing its numbers.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. We should facilitate the doing of the work and the reaching of speedy conclusions, for deferred conclusion is the only thing specifically which I have heard commented upon adversely. And therefore if we can aid the attainment of quicker decisions by this legislation, I am heartily in favor of it.

Yes; I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BORLAND. Is not the aim of regulation, after all, by reducing unnecessary expense and unnecessary competition and discrimination and rebate, and so on, to finally reduce the rates to the ultimate shipper? Is not that the real regulation, and have we attained that under all this matter?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. The end ought to be equity and justice to both sides, and when the property is practically taken out of the hands of its stockholders and its normal managers, and the regulation of its charges and rates, and in a large degree its business is turned over to a commission, then I say it becomes the duty of that commission to behave with equity and justice. It is not a commission created solely for the purpose of reducing rates. If reducing rates works injustice, then the rates ought not to be reduced. It is the duty of that commission to stand as impartial judges, trying to work out a system with regard to the use of a public utility that should at once serve the interest of the shippers and not destroy the property of the bondholders and the stockholders of the various corporations.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I have not the time.

Mr. BORLAND. Just a brief question. Have not the railroads prospered amazingly under this system of regulation? Have they not been very much more prosperous than ever before in their history?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. In some respects the railroads have been benefited by this regulation. If you ask me the particular question as to whether the railroads have prospered under it, I must, as a citizen observing the signs of the time, say that they have not prospered under it or else you would not have the Interstate Commerce Commission to-day considering the question of increase of rates that is made absolutely necessary for the welfare of these great transportation companies and the welfare of the community. And it is in order that that consideration shall not be blocked that this amendment ought not to be considered or passed. If this amendment is written into this law and the bill becomes the law, you put it in the power of any disgruntled man in the community to file a protest and hold up the hands of this commission and prevent an increase that is now demanded by the public as well as by the railroads. To-day the commission has a discretionary power, wisely lodged in it by the law. It may, if the prima facie appearance is such as to warrant it, declare that an advanced rate may become operative at once.

If, on the other hand, it has doubt about it, it can suspend the operation of the rate for a period of 120 days, or four months. At the end of that time, if the conditions are such that in its discretion further time is needed for the consideration of the main question, it can again postpone the action for a period of six months. Thus you have a limit put upon a discretion that ought not to be permitted to run on forever. And yet under the Sims amendment, as I read it, you remove all those restrictions besides taking away from the commission their discretion, and as my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] said, put bonds upon the commission and give them no power of discretion whatsoever. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That section 24 of an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended, be further amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 24. That the Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby enlarged so as to consist of nine members, with terms of seven years, and each shall receive $10,000 compensation annually. The qualifications of the members and the manner of the payment of their salaries shall be as already provided by law. Such enlargement of the commission shall be accomplished through appointment by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, of two additional Interstate Commerce Commissioners, one for a term expiring December 31, 1921, and one for a term expiring December 31, 1922. The terms of the present commissioners, or of any successor appointed to fill a vacancy caused by the death or resignation of any of the present commissioners, shall expire as heretofore provided by law. Their successors and the successors of the additional commissioners herein provided for shall be appointed for the full term of seven years, except that any person appointed to fill a vacancy shall be appointed only for the unexpired term of the commissioner whom he shall succeed. Not more than five commissioners shall be appointed from the same political party."

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The more the framers of this bill argue for it the more apparent it becomes that there is probably reason for defeating it. We all recollect the genesis of the interstate-commerce act away back in 1887. We recollect also that it was full five or six years before it came into anything like effective enforcement and control over the commerce of the country. At that time the railroads were in the habit of giving secret rebates to every habitual shipper, every elevator man, every coal operator, every man who had a stable industry on their line of road. They would even give a special rate to any man who had a carload lot to ship, even if it were household goods. They were in the habit of giving cut rates to all excursions. They were in the habit of having railroad wars, carrying people from Chicago to Kansas City for a dollar, and throwing in a meal sometimes.

They were in the habit of papering the universe with passes, until every respectable white man in every community rode on a pass. No man liked to pay his fare, because it was a reflection on his business and social standing. [Laughter.] It cost the railroads of this country $30,000 a year to print those passes, let alone distributing them.

Now, that was the condition of affairs when the Interstate Commerce Commission took hold of the railroads. The idea, of course, was that the little shipper must be getting it in the neck. The big shipper was getting a special rebate; the big shipper was getting a secret rate. Only one man could buy grain on a certain line of railroad, because he had a special rate. Only one man could ship coal on a certain railroad, because he had a special rate; and it was necessary to have a system of regulation that would give everybody a fair deal.

Now, what has been the result, practically? The result has been that to-day railroads are hauling more cars to a train, with a fewer number of human employees, than ever before in their history. There are more railroads in this country paying interest on their bonds than ever before. There are more of them paying interest on their stock than ever before in the history of the country. They will not give you a pass now under any circumstances, and political conventions have almost gone out of existence for lack of passes. [Laughter.] There is hardly a State in the Union that has not a direct primary now, having been constrained to abandon the assembling of State conventions because of lack of passes at the expense of the railroads. The railroads are getting clean money for their business. They are even charging traveling men for the transportation of their sample cases and trunks. They will charge you for everything. They charge for all excess baggage over 150 pounds. They will even charge you for a glass of water in the dining room before they get through with it. In short, they are making more money than ever before in their history, and that with a less number of employees, and they are hauling the largest amount of freight that they ever hauled.

Has any average shipper got a rebate or a discount in his rates? Not a dollar. Has any of this increased revenue to the railroads gone into the pockets of the American shipper? No. I am unable to find that a single dollar has gone into the pockets of an American shipper.

Now, it is proposed that nobody shall be allowed to complain of an increase in rates, once filed by the railroads, unless the Interstate Commerce Commission permits him to complain. I think that is the substance of this. Instead of giving the American shipper an absolute right to a hearing before an advance in the rate is made, he is not to have that right. I can not think of anything more preposterous.

What would happen if the rates were suspended automatically on the demand of a single shipper? Nothing, except that the old rates would remain in force, and prima facie they are reasonable and just. That is all that could happen. But they want to put advanced rates in force at the option of the railroads, and the shipper must go through a long and painful process, and perhaps to him an impossible process, before he can get a hearing, and then he is not always able to prove his case in the complicated conditions of American business. The case can only be proven by some large community or some great organization of business men. An ordinary individual shipper can not make out a case, even if he gets a hearing. Any man who knows anything about the matter knows fundamentally that that is a fact.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Are not all the rates classified, so that any shipper may know when he comes within a given class? He is not required to make an individual fight, is he?

Mr. BORLAND. Of course, the rates are classified, and if he does take a hand on a particular classification he does it for himself and in behalf of all shippers similarly situated.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. RAYBURN. As I understood the gentleman, he said at the outset that the more he has read this bill the more he is convinced that it ought to be defeated. There is nothing in the gentleman's objection that militates against the bill. He has not pointed out any defect in the bill to which objection can be made.

Mr. BORLAND. The only point that has been debated here largely, I will say to the gentleman from Texas, is the Sims amendment.

Mr. RAYBURN. The gentleman has not stated whether he is for that or against it.

Mr. BORLAND. I am for it. I hope the gentleman is.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON. As to the remark the gentleman made just now about the difficulty of the shipper proving anything, I wish to call the gentleman's attention to the provision in section 15, that as to any increase of the rate since 1910 the burden shall be on the carrier. That is the existing law. That is not changed by this bill at all. It puts the burden on the carrier as to every rate since 1910.

Mr. BORLAND. Then what is the possible objection to the Sims amendment? The Sims amendment, as I understand it, would simply suspend the operation of those rates.

Mr. GORDON. These increases.

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; these increases—the gentleman from Ohio is correct—until a hearing could be had. Then why the opposition to the Sims amendment, if the existing rates are just?

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, partially answering the gentleman's question, I wish to say that there are 100,000 schedules filed every year, and a million or more different rates. If only a small part of that immense number were complained of, you would swamp the commission, and a great number of them might be matters that the commission, from data already in its possession, might be able to pass upon in a preliminary way without a suspension of the rate.

Mr. BORLAND. That was answered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY] who said these rates were based upon certain fixed and known classifications. If a man complains of a rate, he complains of the whole classification. But there are two kinds of rates, what we call class rates and what we call commodity rates, and increases are frequently made in rates by the railroads by transferring a given article from a class rate to a commodity rate, and then changing it back again to a class taking a higher rate. Now, it is not always possible for anyone except a trained lawyer or a trained railroad man to follow these methods; but if this bill ought to pass at all—it does not seem to me that it is an emergency measure in any sense, and I had hoped to touch upon that, but I fear I may not have time—it seems to me if it passes at all it ought to pass with the Sims amendment. But just at this time it appears that the commission is going to be relieved to a large extent of the work of the valuation commission. The transportation committee of the Council of National Defense is taking a great deal of the traffic management off their hands, and it seems to me that there is no real emergency calling for the passage of the bill at this time.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, the deplorable condition of the railroads which the gentleman has described before the institution of the Interstate Commerce Commission may have been true in his part of the country, but I am happy to say to him that it was not true of all the country. And one of the reasons for the inadequacy——

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. GILLETT. I decline to yield. One of the reasons why the railroads to-day are not able to meet the emergency is the loss of public confidence in railroad investments of late years, so that railroads have not been able to keep up the trackage and the cars and other equipment necessary for the immense transportation of to-day. But I did not mean to go into that. I gladly admit the great usefulness and the great advantages of the Interstate Commerce Commission, although I do not think it can be credited with all the improvements in railroad management since it was established. I recognize the fact that it has done away with great abuses which existed, and that it has been a great addition to the welfare both of the railroads and of the people. But while the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] is extolling the usefulness of the Interstate Commerce Commission, I can not see why he wants to reduce their power and limit their discretion, and why he is not willing to trust them to decide when they should have hearings and when they should make suspensions, instead of making a cast-iron rule that any disgruntled shipper or blackmailing lawyer may at any time bring forward a complaint and cause the delay necessary for a hearing.

As I read this bill when it came up the last time, I thought I should vote in favor of it. It seemed to me it was intended to facilitate and expedite the work of the commission in two ways—one by increasing the membership and the other by allowing the commission to divide its force—and I should be glad to support that proposition. But it seems to me that if this Sims amendment should go through, limiting the discretion of the commission and encouraging delays, the bill would do more harm than good. Now, the mere increasing of the size of the commission does not necessarily facilitate its work. The other day I was reading the life of Judge Story, one of the most brilliant men who ever sat in the Supreme Court, and I came across an interesting letter of his which I think is pertinent to this very point. This was in 1828, just after the size of the United States Supreme Court had been increased, and in writing to a friend he said this:

> You may ask how the judges got along together. We made very slow progress and did less in this same time than I ever knew. The addition to our numbers has most sensibly affected our facility as well as rapidity of doing business. "Many men of many minds" require a great deal of discussion to compel them to come to definite results, and we found ourselves often involved in long and very tedious debates. I verily believe if there were 12 judges we should do no business at all, or at least very little.

And what Judge Story said of the Supreme Court of the United States I suppose applies to any other tribunal, and the mere fact of increasing the size of the Interstate Commerce Commission would not necessarily expedite business. But there is also in this bill a provision that the commission may divide itself into sections and in that way make use of its increased size. An increase in size without such a division into sections might obstruct its decisions and require longer deliberaton and therefore cause delay instead of expedition, but by dividing itself up into separate tribunals its work can be hastened. Now I do not wish to be misunderstood. I agree with what the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] says about the great value of the Interstate Commerce Commission. They have done good work, and I believe that if we pass this bill as it stands, rejecting the Sims amendment and increasing their membership and allowing them to divide into sections, we shall thereby increase the expedition and increase the usefulness of this tribunal.

Mr. ADAMSON. I was going to suggest to gentlemen—I will not insist on a request—that as there appeared to be only one matter of great difference in the bill we might wait until we get to some actual amendment and then arrange to speak upon that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That section 17 of said act, as amended, be further amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 17. That the commission may conduct its proceedings in such manner as will best conduce to the proper dispatch of business and to the ends of justice. The commission shall have an official seal, which shall be judicially noticed. Any member of the commission may administer oaths and affirmations and sign subpœnas. A majority of the commission shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business, except as may be otherwise herein provided, but no commissioner shall participate in any hearing or proceeding in which he has any pecuniary interest. The commission may, from time to time, make or amend such general rules or orders as may be requisite for the order and regulation of proceedings before it, or before any division of the commission, including forms of notices and the service thereof, which shall conform, as nearly as may be to those in use in the courts of the United States. Any party may appear before the commission or any division thereof and be heard in person or by attorney. Every vote and official act of the commission, or of any division thereof, shall be entered of record, and its proceedings shall be public upon the request of any party interested.

"The commission is hereby authorized by its order to divide the members thereof into as many divisions as it may deem necessary, which may be changed from time to time. Such divisions shall be denominated, respectively, division 1, division 2, etc. Any commissioner may be assigned to and may serve upon such division or divisions as the commission may direct, and the senior in service of the commissioners constituting any of said divisions shall act as chairman thereof,

In case of vacancy in any division, or of absence or inability to serve thereon of any commissioner thereto assigned, the chairman of the commission, or any commissioner designated by him for that purpose, may temporarily serve on said division until the commission shall otherwise order.

"The commission may by order direct that any of its work, business, or functions arising under this act, or under any act amendatory thereof, or supplemental thereto, or under any amendment which may be made to any of said acts, or under any other act or joint resolution which has been or may hereafter be approved, or in respect of any matter which has been or may be referred to the commission by Congress or by either branch thereof, be assigned or referred to any of said divisions for action thereon, and may by order at any time amend, modify, supplement, or rescind any such direction. All such orders shall take effect forthwith and remain in effect until otherwise ordered by the commission.

"In conformity with and subject to the order or orders of the commission in the premises, each division so constituted shall have power and authority by a majority thereof to hear and determine, order, certify, report, or otherwise act as to any of said work, business, or functions so assigned or referred to it for action by the commission, and in respect thereof the division shall have all the jurisdiction and powers now or then conferred by law upon the commission, and be subject to the same duties and obligations. Any order, decision, or report made or other action taken by any of said divisions in respect to any matters so assigned or referred to it shall have the same force and effect, and may be made, evidenced, and enforced in the same manner, as if made or taken by the commission as a whole. The secretary and seal of the commission shall be the secretary and seal of each division thereof.

"In all proceedings relating to the reasonableness of rates or to alleged discriminations not less than three members shall sit in the hearing and participate in the decision; and in all hearings relating to the valuation of railway property under the act entitled 'An act to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, by providing for a valuation of the several classes of property of carriers subject thereto and securing information concerning their stocks, bonds, and other securities,' approved March 1, 1913, not less than seven members shall sit in the hearing and participate in the decision.

"The salary of the secretary of the commission shall be $7,500 per annum.

"Nothing in this section contained, or done pursuant thereto, shall be deemed to divert the commission of any of its powers."

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Mr. Chairman, is this bill being considered by sections or by paragraphs?

The CHAIRMAN. It is being read by sections.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Then any paragraph would be subject to amendment after it is read?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, the first amendment that I wish to offer is on line 15, page 11, where the word "any" should be "an."

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. The gentleman assumes that any of these paragraphs will be subject to amendment after being read?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. I understood the gentleman from Texas to ask the question and was answered in the negative.

Mr. ADAMSON. Oh, no.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 11, line 13, strike out the word "any" and insert the word "an."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ADAMSON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I move to insert in line 16, page 12, after the word "thereof," the words "subject to the approval of the commission if demanded by either party interested."

The effect of it will be that one of the commissioners can not finally determine the case if either party demands a decision by the commission.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 12, line 16, insert after the word "thereof," the words "subject to the approval of the commission if demanded by either party interested."

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I understood the chairman to say that these divisions of the commission would have authority to pass upon rates, on matters pertaining to the management of the road, and that these divisions might consist of one or more members.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is provided for on the next page.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman's amendment only purposes to grant a review in case any party interested may request it. Does not the gentleman think that the commission itself should have the right to review a finding of a fraction of the commission or a division of the commission in case a substantial number of the commission may wish to review it?

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman thinks that that would strengthen the matter, I will add "or on the motion of the commission itself."

Mr. STAFFORD. I suggest for the consideration of the gentleman an amendment to this effect: Line 23, add after the word "whole" the words "subject, however, to review by the commission when ordered by the commission on petition of any party in interest or when demanded by not less than three members thereof."

Mr. ADAMSON. Why not add to the words that I have suggested "subject to the approval of the commission if demanded by either party in interest or on the motion of the commission itself"?

Mr. STAFFORD. On motion of three members of the commission.

Mr. ADAMSON. Or on the suggestion of three members of the commission.

Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT. Does the gentleman mean by this that wherever either side is dissatisfied by the decision of one division they can take an appeal?

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not wish to suggest any appeal or litigation. But the party wants a decision eo instanti, and has it by a subdivision, and then he wants the entire commission to pass on it.

Mr. GILLETT. Will not the loser always take a chance of an appeal?

Mr. ADAMSON. Oh, no; nine-tenths of the cases will be decided by well-established principles, and will be satisfactory to both sides.

Mr. GILLETT. It looks to me as if the losing side would have nothing to lose and would take an appeal; and, therefore, what advantage you are trying to gain by dividing the commission into groups would be lost, for they will always take an appeal.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not think it would be right for a subdivision of three to pass on an important case if a party demanded a decision by the whole commission.

Mr. GILLETT. Every man thinks his case is an important one, and if he loses he will want to appeal.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 12, line 16, after the word "thereof," insert "subject to the approval by the commission if demanded by either party interested or on the suggestion of three members of the commission."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, if I may be allowed, I think this ought to read "subject to the approval of the commission," without any additional language to it. In the first place, Mr. Chairman, I think that when the commission is authorized to make a division of the work, and they appoint committees, as I assume they are committees, they ought simply to authorize them to hold hearings, collate the facts, and then report the case to the commission and let the commission decide the case.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman from Illinois has struck my original proposition, and the way I first wrote the amendment. I favor its reading in that manner as the gentleman from Illinois has suggested.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to have the gentleman's amendment modified so that it will read "subject to the approval by the commission."

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. If the modification proposed by the gentleman from Illinois is adopted, would that relieve the situation? Would it not put us back simply where we are now, because the entire commission would have to review the case?

Mr. ADAMSON. Every order passed by the subdivision would have to go to the entire commission.

Mr MADDEN. Let us have the amendment read as modified.

Mr ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to so modify my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modified amendment by Mr. ADAMSON: Page 12, line 16, insert after the word "thereof" the following: "subject to approval by the commission."

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, the amendment the gentleman has suggested will not do what he intends.

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes; it will. It is a palladium over all.

Mr. RAYBURN. The gentleman's first amendment said upon demand of either party, but the amendment as accepted now at the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] has nothing like that in it.

Mr. ADAMSON. It means that the subdivision may issue its order but be subject to approval by the commission, and if nobody ever calls attention to it the commission never objects to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a substitute for the amendment offered by the chairman of the committee, and perhaps it will meet with his approval. In line 16, after the word "thereof," insert these words:

An appeal may be allowed upon certificate of one of the commissioners of the subdivision, or by the commission upon the application of either interested party

Just a word in explanation. That is following the analogy of the courts. If you simply leave this to the approval of the commission, they would take it and simply approve or disapprove without having the particular point that was in doubt called to their attention. This gives an opportunity so that if one of the commissioners has serious doubts about a proposition he may issue a certificate, and that would carry it by appeal to the whole commission, or the commission itself upon an application would consider whether or not an appeal should be allowed. It would be a short proceeding and would end the matter quickly, and would perhaps do better and more effective justice than if you leave the matter to the determination of the commission of its own motion, simply perfunctorily looking over the papers.

Mr. ADAMSON. The only objection I have to that is the one already stated, that we are trying to avoid unnecessary pleading and litigation, although generally I am in favor of litigation. We wanted to make this as easy and simple as possible, that this subdivision could do the work, if it was satisfactory to everybody, but if anyone was dissatisfied, or if the commission itself was dissatisfied, the commission would take it up and act upon it, and it can be done simply by mere annotation by anyone, without any formal appeal.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I desire to have the substitute reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offered a substitute, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute offered by Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania: Page 12, line 16, after the word "thereof" insert the following:

"An appeal may be allowed upon certificate of one of the commissioners of the subdivision, or by the commission upon application of either interested party."

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, that does not fit with the text.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I have offered it as a substitute in order to bring it before the committee. The amendment offered by the chairman of the committee was offered to follow the word "thereof," in line 16. It may be that not only his amendment but the substitute ought to find a more logical place in connection with the text in some other part of the section, but my remarks upon the merit of the proposition itself are these. I have used the word "may." It is not obligatory upon the commission to grant the appeal; it is not obligatory when the parties themselves apply to grant an appeal; and whenever a commissioner, having reasonable doubt about some particular question, certifies that, it brings it to the attention of the commission, with a finger pointing out the portion of the note that is the subject of doubt, and therefore, that would direct their attention to it, and there would be the benefit of having that particular thought or subject passed upon. Likewise, if application is made by either party it calls attention to the ground of the application, and the commission is not obliged to grant the appeal, but it may grant the appeal. If the reasons assigned for the appeal come to them with such force and power they will grant it, if it is a matter of justice, and if not they will decline it.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. The gentleman suggests an appeal might be had upon the application of either interested party. Would it not be better to substitute the word "any" for the word "either"?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes; and I ask unanimous consent to substitute the word "any" for the word "either" in the proposed substitute. I would further ask unanimous consent to offer the substitute to follow the word "obligations," in line 18, on page 12.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to modify his substitute. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, the chairman of the committee called attention to this fact, that he thought that the substitute offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania might be cumbersome. It contemplates, as it is now offered, an ex parte application, but to make it sure and plain that it is ex parte, I would suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that he add to the substitute a provision that the certificate may be granted ex parte.

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman will permit——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have one minute more. I would like to ask the gentleman a question or two about the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DECKER. The gentleman uses the word "appeal." Does the gentleman mean appeal in the strict sense of the word, or a rehearing? It does not mean an appeal involving the making up of a new record?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. No.

Mr. DECKER. The gentleman means a rehearing of the same case, a review?

Mr. SIMS. Would not the word "review" cover the case better than "appeal"?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I think it would cover the case better.

Mr. STEVENSON. An appeal may be allowed, but it does not say an appeal to whom.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. The commission.

Mr. STEVENSON. An appeal to the entire commission; then that ought to be inserted.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. DECKER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have one minute in order that I may ask him a question.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask that the gentleman from Missouri be recognized; he is a member of the committee and addressed the Chair several times before, but before doing that I desire to have permission to make one remark. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, great scholar and lawyer that he is, I think fails to reach the matter exactly.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri desire recognition?

Mr. ADAMSON. Just a minute and I will yield the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania may proceed for one minute. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Chairman, I do not so understand the import of the gentleman's amendment. Does his amendment mean upon application of any of the interested parties there may be a rehearing providing one of the commissioners shall so certify?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. No. My amendment is intended——

Mr. DECKER. Or either one of them; that is, a commissioner may send it up of his own volition?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. The same as a judge may certify a question of doubt.

Mr. DECKER. The party may send it up on his own motion?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. No; not send it up; but may make application.

Mr. DECKER. Who passes on his application?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. The commission.

Mr. DECKER. I do not understand yet. What I want to get at is, can any man who has had an adverse decision, simply by making a request, ipso facto, be entitled to a rehearing?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. No; my language is that he may make application for a review and the commission may allow it.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I think the language should be read again; I did not get it that way.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania has taken a hasty view of this matter. The commission is authorized to make its own rules and regulations about all these things within its jurisdiction and in the paragraph beginning at line 10, page 12, a subdivision is authorized to hear, decide, certify, and report certain things, and in respect thereto the division shall have the jurisdiction and powers of the commission. It is perfectly grammatical, and the most grammatical way is to make it read in accordance with my amendment. After the words "and in respect thereof" add the words, "subject to the approval of the commission," which means the full commission, "the division shall have the jurisdiction and powers now or then conferred by law upon the commission." That is plain and simple, and having given jurisdiction to investigate and report those things, they would be authorized to issue an order, subject to the approval of the commission, which means the right of approval be established so that either party or anybody else or the commission itself may see that the approval is made or refused.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman permit a question? My desire is to perfect the bill in any way I can and help in its passage, and in suggesting this language that is my only thought. Now, I see a difficulty in what the gentleman suggests that may be real, or it may be my imagination, but in this, that if it is subject to the approval of the commission they may make the most perfunctory approval imaginable. There is nothing in the proceedings to call the attention of the commission to what is a disputed or a contested subject, and the suggestion that I have made would have obviated that difficulty and still left it absolutely with the commission to approve or disapprove of it, because it would simply provide that the commissioner having a reasonable doubt of what had taken place could certify the existence of that doubt, and the commission may allow a hearing, or either party considering itself aggrieved may state the basis for its grievance and ask the commission to allow a review, and if the commission say "no," that is the end of it, and if the commission thinks it has merit in it, then he gets a rehearing. Now, it seems that brings more pointedly before the commission the question of the right for a review than the general language of mere approval.

Mr. ADAMSON. I concede the gentleman's good intention and I admire his great ability, but he is mistaken in thinking it necessary for us to put in any language about appeal. The commission makes rules and regulations about these things. We establish the right and make the right and power to issue these orders subject to the approval by the commission. There will undoubtedly be regulations made by the commission as to how they will be availed of by either party or by the commission. I think our committee did right in that matter, and I think the amendment I proposed is all sufficient.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman a question as to the construction of his proposed amendment if inserted at the place proposed. It would then read:

And in respect thereof, subject to approval of the commission, the division shall have the jurisdiction and powers now or then conferred by law upon the commission.

Mr. ADAMSON. Read a little further.

Mr. LENROOT. I will.

And be subject to the same duties and obligations.

It seems to me that if it is inserted at that point it will not relate to orders made by the division at all, but merely as to the extent of the powers and jurisdiction which shall be exercised by the division. It seems to me that such an amendment as is to be made should be made to the next sentence, from lines 18 to 23, which deals with the making of orders.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I suggested to the chairman when I first interpolated him that the place for the amendment to go was after the word "whole." I suggest, "Subject to the review of the commission when ordered by the commission, by any party at interest, or when demanded by any party thereof."

Mr. ADAMSON. I should dislike to measure arguments with such linguists as my two friends from Wisconsin, but I would be willing to go before any literary tribunal as to whether or not it was the proper way to convey the meaning. You have to investigate and certify these things and then go on to another provision, "And subject to the approval of the commission, a division shall have all the powers to issue orders." They can hear and certify and report as much as they please, but before they can issue an order it must be subject to the approval of the commission.

Mr. LENROOT. Does not it give the full commission the right to limit any division as to the jurisdiction and powers and duties, and once having made an order the gentleman's amendment would not give the right of review of that order at all?

Mr. ADAMSON. You can not make an order except subject to the approval of the commission.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

I desire to ask the chairman of the committee if he does not think that the language to be used should be "subject to review by the commission," and that those words should be inserted after the word "effect," in line 21?

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not think it would read as well. I read it all over and studied it maturely before I decided where to put it.

Mr. WALSH. If it is in the right place, does not the gentleman think the words should be "subject to review by" rather than "subject to the approval of"?

Mr. ADAMSON. That is a matter of words. I first had it "revision," but I take it the word "approval" means it all.

Mr. WALSH. "Approval" might imply that there remained nothing further to be done but for the commission to sign the findings or decision. The word "review" might imply that somebody would have the right to ask that the decision of the division or the record of the proceedings could be inspected or gone over by the entire board. And it is my idea we ought not to permit a minority of this body to pass upon important questions and to adjudicate finally upon such matters, but that there should be the right reserved to the parties interested to have the entire commission review the findings of the division, made up of a minority of the board.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion there?

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. The language suggested by the gentleman from Georgia was this, "subject to approval by the commission." Now, carrying out the idea of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], how would it do to say "subject to the review and approval"?

Mr. WALSH. That would help it, but I still think it is in the wrong place.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. As to the location, I believe the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] could get together on that.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Well, if you use the words "subject to approval" then you eliminate the sense of "disapproval," do you not?

Mr. MADDEN. That implies revision, does it not?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I am talking about the word "approval." All they can do is to approve it. If you want a general term that would include both approval and disapproval, it would be the word "review."

Mr. WALSH. I think the gentlemn is correct in that.

Mr. MADDEN. If you do not approve you disapprove.

Mr. DECKER. Gentlemen of the committee, I wish to call your attention to the fact that what we are discussing here is not a matter of form of words only. There are two different ideas here presented.

Now, the object of this bill, as I understand it, is to facilitate the work of the Interstate Commerce Commission. You can do it in one of two ways.

You can have your subdivisions and give them some authority and let them do the work and pass upon it and finish it, subject to a review, provided one of these commissioners thinks there is something worth putting before the whole commission; or you can take the other method, as presented by the chairman, and let everything be subject to review. And let me suggest to you that, in my humble opinion, when you do that you have simply increased the number of officers in the United States and have not facilitated the transaction of business before the Interstate Commerce Commission.

That very principle is one of the things that causes the endless and unnecessary delay in the administration of justice in our courts to-day. You take the appellate courts in the State of Missouri to-day; we have an appellate court that passes on cases amounting to $7,500, and we have a supreme court over all of them, and you can take a case from that appellate court to the supreme court, not because one of the litigants who has been ruled against wants it to go there, but he can take it by his application, provided one of the judges who has passed upon it has a reasonable doubt about the matter and thinks it ought to be passed upon by the higher court. But if you let the entire case go to the whole commission when any man who has been ruled against wants it to go there, I submit that then every case will be decided by the entire commission, and you will find you have not advanced the work of the commission by a single solitary day. The thing that has tended most to destroy the efficiency of this commission, in my humble opinion, is the fact that it is overburdened with work. The people of the country should have a decision.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DECKER. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. If this proposed amendment should be adopted, it would not require the whole commission to hold a new hearing. They would simply go over the decision that was made, and that might be done in a very brief time. They would not be required to call the witnesses.

Mr. DECKER. The answer to that is this, gentlemen, and I crave your attention: It means just one of two things, either that the entire commission will give a perfunctory approval, or else, if it gives an honest, conscientious, painstaking investigation of it, it will take just as long as it would if they started out and made the investigation in the first place. You can choose either horn of the dilemma. You can give it a perfunctory approval, and in that way hasten the work; but where the case is of vital importance and where the decision rendered is in conflict with the ruling of the entire commission and it ought to be called to the attention of all of them, in that case you will always find the commissioners willing to make a certification and allow the entire commission to pass upon it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. DECKER. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman know of any board or commission or tribunal in which a minority of it can make a final decision?

Mr. DECKER. That is where the gentleman makes his error, when you divide the country into divisions. If we think it wise, we can make the decision of a division final.

Mr. WALSH. Declaring it so would not make it so.

Mr. DECKER. They are our creatures. We are the creators of this commission. We can say that one man's decision shall be final, and that would be better than having the railroads of this country tied up and the commerce of the country stopped. Gentlemen, something must be done. You must move the wheels. The people must have a hearing.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have two minutes more. I want to ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. BORLAND. It is assumed that if this commission is divided into, say, three divisions, consisting of three commissioners each, they will be sitting in different parts of the country, hearing totally different cases without connection with each other.

Now, suppose a case arises where one of the litigants conceives that the ruling of a certain subdivision of the commission in his part of the country is utterly contrary to the ruling of the whole commission or contrary to the ruling of some other subdivision of the commission in some other part of the country. How can he get that entire hearing before the full commission by his own action?

Mr. DECKER. According to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] he could do that by calling attention to the inconsistency or difference in ruling to the commission or the subdivision that passed upon the case, and I assume that those men are honest enough either to reverse their own decision or ask the whole commission to make a new ruling.

Mr. BORLAND. Suppose the subdivision already has that question presented to them, that it is contrary to the ruling of the whole commission, and they contend that it is not, and they are in harmony with the previous ruling of the entire commission, and the litigant is still certain that they are wrong?

Mr. DECKER. The answer is simple. There must be an end of litigation and contest, and you must bow somewhere to somebody's decision. The same thing can be stated of the Supreme Court of the United States as to the Adamson law or as to any other law. There is always a dissenting opinion delivered, and they may say this is not in harmony with the opinion of the country. But we must bow to their decision.

Mr. WALSH. But in that case it is a decision of a majority and not a decision of a minority.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has again expired.

Mr. DECKER. I want to answer that question, because it is important. I do not know that I will use all the time, but I would like to have five minutes. We are getting down to the meat of this matter.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri to proceed for five minutes more?

There was no objection.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman from Missouri proceeds with his five minutes I would like to ask, in the interest of facilitating the debate, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] will give me his attention, will the gentleman be satisfied with the provision that will, in effect, say "subject to the decision of the commission under rules and regulations to be established by the commission"?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I have sent up to the desk an amendment, and I would like, by unanimous consent, to have it read, embodying the language of the proposition.

Mr. ADAMSON. Is it a new proposition?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. It is substantially the same, but in new language.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to modify his substitute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania offers to modify his substitute amendment as follows: Page 12, line 23, after the word "whole," insert: "Provided, That a review may be allowed by the commission upon certificate of one of the commissioners of any division or upon the application of any of the parties."

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask that debate on this end after the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] has had his five minutes.

Mr. LENROOT. I will ask the gentleman to withdraw that request.

Mr. ADAMSON. At the suggestion of the gentleman from Wisconsin, I withdraw it.

Mr. DECKER. I do not want to take any more time or to seem contentious, but my objection to that substitute, as I understand it, is that upon the application of any litigant he may have the case passed on by the entire commission.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. He may apply for a review.

Mr. DECKER. To whom?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. To the commission.

Mr. DECKER. To the whole commission?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes. They can hear it in chambers or ex parte, or they can hear it upon the papers alone.

Mr. DECKER. I do not know that I shall object to that. I suppose that is under the theory that the rules and regulations of the commission——

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. They are not obliged to grant the review.

Mr. DECKER. I would not object to that. There is a point in the contention of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] that we do not want to get the different subdivisions of the commission into conflict with each other, and I suppose that if a showing was made that a decision of one division in one part of the country differed from the decision of another division in another part of the country, then the whole commission would take up the decisions and reconsider them.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DECKER. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Do I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania to say that the effect of his amendment would be that where one of the parties to a contest before the commission was dissatisfied with a decision, the right of that party to an appeal to the entire commission would depend upon whether or not one of the commissioners would certify his appeal?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. No; it is in the alternative. For instance, if there are three commissioners in a subdivision who hear a case, and one of them has a serious doubt as to the validity of the judgment that has been rendered, and so certifies, then the whole commission may order a review. Then, if either of the parties applies to the commission for a review, he may get it, but it is all "may" with the commission.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. That is exactly the point. I am interested not in whether one of the commissioners is dissatisfied with the decision, but whether or not either of the parties may have the right of appeal.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. He has the right to appeal to the commission and to call the attention of the commission to the subject of his complaint, and, if they deem it sufficient, they may order a review; or, if not, they can deny it.

Mr. DECKER. I want to ask the gentleman from Texas a question: If every litigant has a right, on his own motion, to take an appeal to the whole commission, does the gentleman really think that the work of the commission will be hastened or that we will have decisions on these important questions any more quickly than we are having them now?

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I will answer the gentleman in this way: If I understand the purpose of this act, it is that these subdivisions of the commission shall go into different parts of the country and have their hearings and make their rulings, and this bill provides that the ruling of one of these subdivisions shall become the ruling of the commission as a whole.

Mr. DECKER. Is that the case?

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. In that particular case. For instance, when they have a hearing in the State of Missouri, at that hearing all the facts concerning a certain rate are adduced.

Now, I contend that if the aggrieved party in that case feels that the decision, perhaps reached by a divided commission, is unjust, he ought to have the right, upon his motion, to have that case reviewed by the entire commission, if he wishes it, on the record as he had it made up before the subdivision of the commission.

Mr. DECKER. What would he do to-day in case he was aggrieved by a decision of the commission as it now exists?

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. The commissioner comes down here and hears the case by himself.

Mr. DECKER. Suppose they all rule against him?

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. He is out of court, and that ends it.

Mr. DECKER. How many commissioners are there to-day?

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Seven.

Mr. DECKER. And in these divisions how many is it proposed to have?

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Three.

Mr. ALEXANDER. But there may be only one under the bill.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to have the amendment read in my time, that we may know more about it.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read the amendment.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, gentlemen will observe that it is to be left optional with the commission—"the commission"—to grant or not grant a review. Now, what do those words, "the commission" mean? The three commissioners who make the original decision are a part of the commission; and are they to take part in saying whether there shall or shall not be a review? If they are not, then the other six of the nine will grant or not grant a review, and the complaining shipper, in order to secure a review, must get a majority—that is, four—of those six members to grant his request. But, with the three who made the decision, opposed to having it reviewed, and talking to their fellow commissioners about its justice, the shipper might not stand very much of a chance if everything is to be left optional with "the commission."

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. May I suggest that the amendment proposes that the review may be had upon a certificate of one of the commission, or upon the application of any of the parties?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Oh, no; that is not what it means. Will the gentleman let me make a suggestion? In the State of New York we have three courts—the court of original jurisdiction, the court of intermediate or appellate jurisdiction, and the court of ultimate resort. To get to the court of ultimate resort from the court of intermediate jurisdiction we have to do one of two things—obtain a certificate of the intermediate court or of one of the judges of the court of ultimate resort. That is about what this would mean. We have never found a case that ought to go to the court of appeals that did not go.

As a matter of experience and observation I can assure the gentleman that the deserving cases, cases that are really doubtful in law and fact, do go and work out just about as this provision is drawn to work out, and it was drawn with the idea of making it similar to that provision.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Now, nobody wishes to harm the railroads. But it is well in discussing this section to remember that the increasing of railroad rates is practically the levying of a tax on the commerce of the country, the levying of a tax to make dividends for corporations. It is a tremendous power. The increasing of rates concerns not only the complainant who brings the case before the Interstate Commerce Commission, but also all of the people who are compelled to ship over the road. And many are compelled to ship over it. For a railroad is a monopoly of transportation, a monopoly that many businesses must of necessity use until something is invented for purposes of transportation to take the place of railroads. Shippers can no more escape paying railroad rates than they can escape paying Government taxes. And therefore a case before the Interstate Commerce Commission differs widely and fundamentally from an ordinary lawsuit between private individuals. A case involving the justice or injustice of railroad rates is one of serious public importance. And for this reason, always when the question is one of the increasing of rates and the determining whether the tax proposed to be thus collected is just or unjust, the final decision ought to be rendered by the full commission. And the law ought to provide for a review by the full commission of the decision of a division of three members as a matter of right, and not as a mere privilege, the granting of which is optional.

Mr. ADAMSON. While the gentleman is on the floor I want him to hear me ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if we can not compose the differences and end this literary discussion with this proposition: To add, after the word "whole," in line 23, page 12, the following:

Provided, however, That the action of any division shall be subject to review and approval by the commission, and application therefor may be made by any of the parties affected thereby.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I am willing to accept that.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the other.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to withdraw his original amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I now offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania withdraw his substitute?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes; and I accept the one offered by the chairman of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman from Pennsylvania withdrawing his substitute?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ADAMSON: Page 12, line 23, after the period in line 23, insert:

"Provided, however, That the action of any division shall be subject to review and approval by the commission, and application therefor may be made by any of the parties affected thereby.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, ought not that to be "decision" instead of "action"?

Mr. ADAMSON. No.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I think an amendment like this certainly ought to go into this bill, when you increase the number and provide for a hearing and final decision on any matter by one of these subdivisions of the entire commission. If that is not done, you certainly will have confusion worse confounded. A man holding hearings in one section of the country and rendering an opinion with reference to a rate or decision in that section of the country might conflict with a rate or decision in other sections of the country, and therefore it is essential that some central mind in the seven or the nine members, if you make it nine members, shall make determination of these differences. Therefore the right ought to be in any member of these subcommittees to ask a review by the full commission, and every party, whether he is a party eo nomine in the litigation, or any of the interests that may be affected by the decision of the subcommittee, ought to have the right to have the full commission pass on important matters affecting the entire country. Therefore, in order that you may have harmonious decision, it is necessary that you should have the final mind determine all cases. If not, you will have too many decisions and too much confusion in matters of great concern, and it would be better, I submit, even though they get a little behind to have just a little delay and have a final decision upon the question, so that the whole country may know finally what the decision would be, because no man believes that the decision of one of these subcommittees is going to be submitted to by the millions of people that may be affected, because they would instantly begin another proceeding for the purpose of reversing what the three might do, if it was not in accordance with the interests of the country. Therefore I do not think that you will get anywhere with your subcommittees and make any progress, unless you shall have the subcommittee make the investigation and render its decision subject always to review by the entire commission.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If you are going to have the whole commission pass on this matter in every case at last, what is the sense in increasing the number of the commission?

Mr. SISSON. I think there is a great deal of sense in it. In the first place, thousands of cases will be filed where the mere statement, perhaps, of the case will find a precedent already deciding the question. If the full commission simply has the right of review of the evils that I see in having a final decision rendered by the subcommittee, the full commission then would take the matter up and harmonize its decision with the decisions they hold to be correct in those particular cases, but it does not require a decision ab initio. It is simply like the review of a court.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why can not three do that as well as nine?

Mr. SISSON. The three could do it, but the three might render one decision in one section of the country and another three another decision in another section of the country. Therefore, for all of the States, although you may have subordinate courts, there must be a court of final and ultimate jurisdiction to determine the matter.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. And you could have more hearings going on at the same time where there are nine.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What good will it do to have the hearings going on all over the country with these subdivisions if the whole commission is to review the case at last?

Mr. SISSON. They do not have to do it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. But this would make it imperative.

Mr. SISSON. I do not think so. On the contrary, I think the amendment is so drawn that the evils I endeavored to point out that might come from an ultimate decision by the subcommittee, without being passed on by the full commission, could be taken care of under this amendment, because the right of the commission then would be absolute to deny a rehearing of the matter. It would be like a brief you file in a case in the Supreme Court.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SISSON. You get the points of difference at issue by the hearing of three, and the only thing then to be determined by the full commission would be the principle involved in any particular case. It would not mean that they would go through all the entire hearing, and all of the entire evidence. I think a great deal of progress can be made by having the subcommittees.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. And it would prevent conflicting decisions?

Mr. SISSON. Yes; and the purpose of having this commission pass finally on the matter would be that you could have a definite fixed rule all over the United States in reference to all questions of shipment.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Would these subcommittees be governed by a former decision of the whole commission, or would they set up their own Jacob's staff?

Mr. SISSON. If a subdivision should set up its own Jacob's staff, it ought to be reviewed. In the event that they follow the line of the full commission, the full commission could decide it that way, but if they set up a new Jacob's staff, it would take only a short time for the commission to settle it.

Mr. ADAMSON. One of the very purposes of this amendment is to enable the commission itself to see that all of the rulings are harmonized and accord with one another.

Mr. SISSON. It is essential that something of that sort should be in this bill. When you have three men or one man go and hear a case, there ought to be a matter of easy review.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Georgia be again reported.

There was no objection, and the amendment was again reported.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, let me suggest to the chairman of the committee that he does not mean to insert that after the period. The period should be stricken out and a colon inserted.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is correct. I ask unanimous consent to modify the amendment by striking out the period and inserting a colon.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be so modified.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LENROOT: Add after the Adamson amendment the following:

Provided further, That any order of a division reviewed by the commission as herein provided shall not become effective until approved by the commission, unless otherwise ordered by the commission.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I accept that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, on page 13, line 3, as suggested by the Senator at the other end, which is correct, the language ought to be clarified a little. In line 3, beginning a little further back, it reads, "not less than three members shall sit in the hearing and participate in the decision." I wish to amend that language so as to read "not less than three members shall participate in the hearing and decision."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 13, line 3, after the word "shall," strike out the words "sit in the hearing and," and after the word "the" insert the words "hearing and," so it will read:

"In all proceedings relating to the reasonableness of rates or of alleged discriminations not less than three members shall participate in the hearing and decision."

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That means that the subdivision——

Mr. ADAMSON. This is the entire commission.

Mr. ESCH. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee whether the use of the words "participate in the hearings" would necessitate the presence of the members of a division in a hearing in Chicago or St. Louis or San Francisco? In other words, would it require the members of a division to travel around the country, or will all these hearings have to be centered at Washington?

Mr. ADAMSON. Well, in this case it provides that three may hear the question of rates, and that all three must participate in a hearing and decision. Now, as to whether it means that some members of the commission can go out to lunch and leave the others and then come back, and little things like that, I do not think that will count.

Mr. ESCH. Here is the point. As the gentleman understands, a vast amount of testimony is now taken in railroad cases. That is taken by examiners who travel throughout the country, and they present their testimony to the commission with an abstract as to facts and as to principles of law. Then the commission or one of the commissioners accepts those findings of facts and principles of law and goes over the case and makes a report and then it goes up to the full commission. Under the amendment, it seems to me, three members of a division would have to travel around the country or else the hearings would have to be held in Washington.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not think it means that. If three members sit and hear interrogatories they participate in the hearings. They sit and consider evidence. They may not hear the verbal witness, but they have his testimony and consider and act on it.

Mr. ESCH. Even that would be a tremendous task if they had to read the interrogatories taken by the examiners.

Mr. ADAMSON. This has been insisted on by the Seante, and they say we will never get by without it. I think we ought to have it.

Mr. ESCH. That is not conclusive to me.

Mr. ADAMSON. No. I do not think so; but——

Mr. LENROOT. I would like to ask if inserting the words "final hearings" might not accomplish all that is desired and remove a portion at least of the objection raised by the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. ADAMSON. It seems to me this language makes it workable.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I would like to ask the gentleman from Georgia if he does not think there ought to be an amendment of this sort: In line 1, page 13, after the word "proceedings," insert the words "before any division"?

Mr. ADAMSON. No, sir. We are talking here about the entire commission in this paragraph, and we say they shall not make a subdivision to pass on rates of less than three and shall not make one to pass on valuation—they have it less than seven, but I am going to substitute a quorum.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Well, the gentleman means no division of the commission would consider rates?

Mr. ADAMSON. Shall not be less than three.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. This says, "in all proceedings relating to the reasonableness of rates." A hearing before the commission would be a proceeding in regard to the reasonableness of rates.

Mr. ADAMSON. In all proceedings in regard to the reasonableness of rates not less than three members shall participate in a hearing.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That is a proceeding before a division of the full commission.

Mr. ADAMSON. We are talking about dealing with rates through the commission, and we are qualifying this subdivision by saying "not less than three shall participate."

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. But a proceeding before the full commission would be a proceeding relative to the rate. It ought to be amended by inserting, after the word "proceedings," on line 1, page 13, "in all proceedings before a division of the commission."

Mr. ADAMSON. May I say "before a division"? It means as it is now in a proceeding either before the whole commission or a division. I do not think you improve it any.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment pending offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON].

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. My amendment is not an amendment to the amendment. It is a regular amendment. I have no objection to the one offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I have another committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 13, line 12, after the word "than," strike out the words "seven members" and insert in lieu thereof the words "a quorum."

Strike out of the same line the word "sit" and insert in lieu thereof the word "participate," and in line 13 strike out the words "participate in the."

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do I understand that this language the gentleman suggests would be susceptible of an interpretation that on questions relating to the valuation of railroads and the like, as herein enumerated, that a quorum of a division——

Mr. ADAMSON. A quorum of the commission.

Mr. STAFFORD. It does not say that. There is nothing herein that restricts the hearing of the matters relating to valuation of property.

Mr. ADAMSON. I move to modify the amendment and say "a quorum of the commission."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why not insert the word "five"?

Mr. ADAMSON. That is easier.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the modified amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modified amendment offered by Mr. ADAMSON: Page 13, line 12, strike out the word "seven" and insert "five."

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. GARNER. Let us have the amendment voted on.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment pending.

Mr. BORLAND. I am discussing the amendment. I desire to oppose it.

Mr. ADAMSON. I shall ask for a vote at the end of five minutes.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, we have spent the afternoon here now discussing verbal changes in this bill which comes from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman allow me to make the motion?

Mr. BORLAND. I will.

Mr. ADAMSON. I ask unanimous consent that after the five minutes occupied by the gentleman the debate shall be closed.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

That is on this amendment to the amendment?

Mr. ADAMSON. That is right.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, we have spent the entire afternoon here, with a minority of the House, of course, discussing verbal changes in this bill that has come from the committee, and when we get through I undertake to say there will not be a man in the House that knows the legal effect of the language or has been able to keep in his mind all the various changes that are made. Yet every change in an important bill of this kind necessarily must affect very seriously the legal operation of the law. This is an amendment of the great interstate commerce act. It proposes a brand-new scheme, apparently, of enlarging the commission and dividing it into subdivisions.

Now, I, for one, am not willing to give any three members of the commission, or any minority of the commission, a chance to establish an advance of 15 per cent in railroad rates or decide any other serious problem of that kind. Yet we came very nearly doing that as this bill came out of the committee, and if it had not been for a great deal of patient pulling and hauling here and discussion, of which we do not yet know the legal effect, we would have done that very thing.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield a moment so that I may correct him? I gave notice two weeks ago of this identical amendment.

Mr. BORLAND. I do not yield. We have had a verbal controversy as to how many members would participate, and what a participation might mean, whether it would mean an attendance at the actual hearing or some other method of participation. It is perfectly apparent that this bill ought to go back to the committee. It is perfectly apparent that we ought not to take the risk, at this stage of the session, with only a minority of the House present, and in this informal way, of passing a law amending the great interstate commerce act and affecting every shipper in the United States. The bill ought not to pass in its present form. It ought not to have been brought up in its present form. It ought to have been more thoroughly considered. We ought to have had a report here which would have explained these particular changes and their effect upon the shipping interests of the United States. The shipping interests are not going to permit their rights to be foreclosed by the dividing of the commission into small divisions, sending them around to review some action about a blanket change of rate, or a change of classification, which in the last analysis is always an advance of rates.

The shippers of the country are interested in seeing those things. This tribunal was not created primarily to give the railroads of the country an advance of rates. It was created primarily to see to it that shippers should get a fair deal, and if it has not that as an excuse for its existence it has no excuse for its existence at all, because nobody doubts that the railroads can take care of their own end of it without the aid of the commission. The whole act has safeguards thrown around it so that the shippers do not suffer. I do not believe that we ought to divide this great commission, charged as it is now with great responsibility by the American people, and make separate divisions and scatter that responsibility before the American people so that nobody will be able to say on whose responsibility it is that there has been a change of rates.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] has an amendment pending.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman from Tennessee wants to offer an amendment, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SIMS. Yes; I want to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin: On page 13, line 1, after the word "proceedings," insert the following: "before any such division."

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I think the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], will agree that this amendment ought to be adopted after he gives the bill a careful reading. By turning to the bottom of page 12 he will find this:

The secretary and seal of the commission shall be the secretary and seal of each division thereof.

In all proceedings relating to the reasonableness of rates or to alleged discriminations not less than three members shall sit in the hearing and participate in the decision.

Now, then, that proceeding before the division of the commission can be appealed from, and then there will be a hearing before the full commission, or rather a quorum of the full commission.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman state again his amendment?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the Clerk please read the amendment as I sent it up?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin: On page 13, line 1, after the word "proceedings," insert "before any such division."

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The Clerk evidently has not my amendment. It was on a small piece of paper.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 13, line 1, after the word "proceedings," insert "before such division."

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It should be "any such division," because of language in the line before, "seal of each division thereof."

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I accept that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. THOMPSON). The gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the pending amendment by striking out the word "such," and would like to be recognized.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It ought to be "such," because it is a division thereof.

Mr. STAFFORD. I move to amend the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment has been agreed to, and the gentleman from Wisconsin arose after the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] had gotten recognition.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then I ask unanimous consent to offer my amendment, because it relates to the amendment which I assumed was pending when I rose to offer my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield?

Mr. SIMS. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The word "such" ought to be in the amendment for the same reason that the word "thereof" appears at the bottom of the next page.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not think it ought to be modified.

Mr. GARNER. The bill goes to conference, anyway. Let it go.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is there objection to my request?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin did not have the floor. The gentleman from Tennessee had been recognized.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent to offer my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin for the purpose of asking unanimous consent?

Mr. SIMS. If there is not going to be any fight over it, I will yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. I offer it as an amendment to the amendment that is pending.

Mr. ADAMSON. There is no amendment pending. The amendment has been agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] asks unanimous consent to return to the amendment which has just been adopted for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Now, I move to strike out the word "such" from the amendment offered by my colleague.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. STAFFORD moves to strike out the word "such" from the amendment of Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin just adopted, so that it will read "before any division."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, at the end of line 13, page 13, and I will ask the Clerk to read the penciled interlineation as well as the typewritten words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 13, page 13, insert the following: "The second paragraph of section 15 of the act to regulate commerce"——

Mr. STAFFORD. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will this prevent our perfecting the present section later in the consideration of this bill?

Mr. SIMS. No.

Mr. STAFFORD. This amendment that the gentleman offers is virtually a new section.

Mr. BORLAND. The understanding was that the whole section was subject to amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman offer it as a new section?

Mr. BORLAND. No; as an amendment to the pending section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert, immediately after line 13, page 13, the following: The second paragraph of section 15 of the act to regulate commerce as amended is further amended so that the said second paragraph of said section 15 shall read as follows:

"Whenever there shall be filed with the commission any schedule stating a new individual or joint rate, fare, or charge, or any new individual or joint classification, or any new individual or joint regulation or practice affecting any rate, fare, or charge, the commission, upon its own initiative, may, and upon complaint or protest by any person, firm, corporation, or association which under this act would have the right to file an application for a change in the rate, fare, charge, or classification or practice should it go into effect, shall, at once, and if it so orders, without answer or other formal pleading by the interested carrier or carriers, but upon reasonable notice, enter upon a hearing concerning the reasonableness and propriety of such rate, fare, charge, classification, regulation, or practice; and pending such hearing and the decision thereon the operation of such schedule shall be suspended and the use of such rate, fare, charge, classification, regulation, or practice shall be deferred until after full hearing, and shall take effect only after the commission has found and declared the same to be just and reasonable, neither unjustly discriminatory nor unduly preferential or prejudicial nor otherwise in violation of the provisions of this act, and after full hearing the commission shall make such order in reference to said rate, fare, charge, classification, regulation, or practice as would be proper in a proceeding initiated after the rate, fare, charge, classification, regulation, or practice had become effective.

"The foregoing provision shall apply to all such schedules now on file with the commission, but which have not become effective, but shall not apply to any schedule filed in pursuance of an order of the commission.

"At any hearing involving a rate or fare which has been increased since January 1, 1910, or a rate or fare sought to be increased by any such schedule now on file, but which has not taken effect, or a rate or fare which is sought to be increased by any such schedule hereafter filed the burden of proof to show that the increased rate or fare, or the proposed increased rate or fare, is just and reasonable shall be upon the common carrier, and the commission shall give to the hearing and the stating of such questions preference over all other questions pending before it and decide the same as speedily as possible."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to have pending the point of order that the amendment is not germane to this section.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Colorado make the point of order that there is no quorum present?

Mr. KEATING. I do.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. ADAMSON. I hope the gentleman will not be precipitate. We have a good deal of business to get through with.

Mr. BORLAND. I am not precipitate. It is 5.20 o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri moves that the committee do now rise. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri.

The question being taken, the motion was rejected.

Mr. ADAMSON. We can get through with this thing in a few minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado makes the point of no quorum, and the Chair will count. [After counting.] Eighty-seven Members present, not a quorum.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I will ask for a minute to see if we can come to some understanding.

Mr. BORLAND. I make the point of order that nothing is in order except calling the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and the Speaker having taken the chair, Mr. THOMPSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill S. 1816, finding itself without a quorum, had caused the roll to be called, and 241 Members answered to their names, and he presented a list of the absentees.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I want to have pending a point of order on the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman from Tennessee if we can not agree on a limited time for debate.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not think it is good practice in the legislative policy of this House to offer an amendment that amends section 15, when you are seeking to amend section 17 of the interstate-commerce act. It should be offered as a separate section. Saying that the section should be amended as follows—to have it inserted in line 13, as suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee—is an anchronism.

Mr. ADAMSON. I want to ask the gentleman if we can not agree on five minutes on a side for debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin insists on his point of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane to this section. I do not doubt for one minute that this amendment may be in order as a separate section.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I will offer it as a separate section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment by offering it as a separate section. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer a preferential motion to amend the section by striking out, in line 15, page 13, the figures "$7,500" and inserting "$5,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 13, line 15, strike out "$7,500" and insert "$5,000."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the committee seeks to increase the salary of the secretary of the commission from $5,000 to $7,000. The salary of the commissioners is $10,000. There is no instance where the salary of any secretary of any other commission receives more than $5,000. The secretary of the Federal Trade Commission, the secretary of the Farm Loan Board, the secretary of the Shipping Board, the secretary of the Tariff Commission all receive $5,000 a year or less. It is only one case, it is true, but I protest against its being adopted here, in view of the fact that it will be used as a precedent for increasing the salaries of the secretaries of every other commission and the heads of the bureaus of the various departments. Think of it for a moment. The Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury, in whom are lodged much greater responsibility than in the secretary of this commission, who performs only ministerial duties, receive $5,000 a year. The Assistant Postmasters General receive $5,000 a year, and now you are seeking to raise here the salary of a man who has a life tenure of office from $5,000 to $7,000, when the members of the commission themselves, who are supposed to be versed in technical knowledge concerning railway matters, receive only $10,000 a year. It is out of harmony with the salaries paid the commissioners. Even the Senate, when this proposal was presented by the Senate Commerce Committee at $7,500, rejected it, and in the Senate bill which is here before you the salary was fixed at $5,000. We can not in these times establish a policy of increasing the salary of any official when we are not increasing his burdens. The secretary of this commission, as the prior secretaries of the commission have been, is a good man no doubt. No one questions that; but he performs no work of any very high order. He performs work of a ministerial character, not work requiring rare executive ability.

There are plenty of men in the country who can be found to perform this work at much less than $5,000 a year. Are we here in the House, when the Senate has taken action against this increase, to vote to increase it to $7,500? Are we to establish a new grade, and have the subcommittee in charge of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, of which I am a member, confronted next year and at all times, when the heads of the departments come before us to increase the salaries of the heads of the bureaus and the Assistant Secretaries, with the argument that the House itself in war times, when we should be saving and economical, increased the salary of this secretary from $5,000 to $7,500?

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. Does the gentleman seriously compare the duties of the secretary of the Interstate Commerce Commission with the duties of the secretary of the Federal Trade Commission?

Mr. STAFFORD. I say here that the work of the Assistant Secretaries of the Navy, the work of the Assistant Secretaries of War, of the Assistant Secretaries of State, who receive only $5,000 a year, the work of the Assistant Postmasters General, the work of all these assistants is far greater and more responsible than the work of the secretary of the Interstate Commerce Commission; and if we are going to establish a $7,500 salary for this secretary, we must in consonance, when the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill is before us, increase the salaries of these other officials to correspond. This is no time for us to increase salaries. This same committee two weeks ago brought in a proposal to increase the salary of the head of the War-Risk Insurance Bureau from $5,000 to $7,500, and in Committee of the Whole we voted down that recommendation after full discussion, participated in by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and others. It is not a pleasant task to rise here and call the attention of the committee to the fact that it will create this confusion in the future arrangement of salaries, but I think the House should have this information. The salary of this secretary should not at this time be increased.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon this amendment now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced the ayes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. ADAMSON) there were—ayes 114, noes 34.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House as amended, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I withhold the motion.

Mr. ESCH. I desire to move to strike out section 3. It has no relevancy. It was stricken out in the Senate.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman is mistaken. There is no statute fixing the salary except at $3,500. He is being paid $5,000 in an appropriation bill, and this makes it statutory at the same time. I think the gentleman had better withdraw the amendment and let it be made statutory.

Mr. ESCH. Very well, if it does not make any difference——

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I renew the motion.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. No, I do not. I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House as amended, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. THOMPSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the bill S. 1816 had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Wait until the Chair puts the motion.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit the bill with instructions to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to report the same back immediately with the Sims amendment, which is at the desk.

Mr. ADAMSON. I move the previous question on the motion.

Mr. KEATING. And I wish to have the amendment reported.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia moves the previous question on the motion to recommit. The motion is to recommit the bill to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce with directions to report the same back instanter with the Sims amendment added.

Mr. KEATING. Which I ask the Clerk to report.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion. The Clerk has not the amendment. It was carried off by one of the reporters to be copied.

Mr. SIMS. It is in the RECORD of the proceedings of the 13th of this month.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

Mr. KEATING. I object.

The SPEAKER. The amendment is here. The Clerk will report the motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. KEATING moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, with instructions to that committee to report the bill back forthwith with the following amendment:

Insert, immediately after line 13, page 13, the following: The second paragraph of section 15 of the act to regulate commerce as amended is further amended so that the said second paragraph of said section 15 shall read as follows:

"Whenever there shall be filed with the commission any schedule stating a new individual or joint rate, fare, or charge, or any new individual or joint classification, or any new individual or joint regulation or practice affecting any rate, fare, or charge, the commission upon its own initiative may, and upon complaint or protest by any person, firm, corporation, or association which under this act would have the right to file an application for a change in the rate, fare, charge, or classification, or practice, should it go into effect, shall at once, and if it so orders, without answer or other formal pleading by the interested carrier or carriers, but upon reasonable notice, enter upon a hearing concerning the reasonableness and propriety of such rate, fare, charge, classification, regulation, or practice; and pending such hearing and the decision thereon the operation of such schedule shall be suspended and the use of such rate, fare, charge, classification, regulation, or practice shall be deferred until after full hearing, and shall take effect only after the commission has found and declared the same to be just and reasonable, neither unjustly discriminatory nor unduly preferential or prejudicial, nor otherwise in violation of the provisions of this act, and after full hearing the commission shall make such order in reference to said rate, fare, charge, classification, regulation, or practice as would be proper in a proceeding initiated after the rate, fare, charge, classification, regulation, or practice had become effective.

"The foregoing provision shall apply to all such schedules now on file with the commission, but which have not become effective, but shall not apply to any schedule filed in pursuance of an order of the commission.

"At any hearing involving a rate or fare which has been increased since January 1, 1910, or a rate of fare sought to be increased by any such schedule now on file, but which has not taken effect, or a rate or fare which is sought to be increased by any such schedule hereafter filed the burden of proof to show that the increased rate or fare, or the proposed increased rate or fare, is just and reasonable shall be upon the common carrier, and the commission shall give to the hearing and the stating of such questions preference over all other questions pending before it and decide the same as speedily as possible."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BORLAND. Division, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. Did the gentleman make the point of no quorum?

Mr. KEATING. I will withdraw it.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 51, noes 110.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] makes the point of no quorum, and the Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and four Members are present; not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of this motion to recommit will when their names are called answer "yea," and those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 76, nays 156, answered "present" 2, not voting 196, as follows:

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Speaker, I voted "no." I am paired with Mr. RUCKER, of Missouri.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the gentleman's name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. KINKAID, and he answered "Present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors. The question is on the passage of the Senate bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BORLAND. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 168, noes 18.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and five Members are present; not a quorum.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, it is so near a quorum that I believe a demand for tellers would develop a quorum.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri moves that the House do now adjourn. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for tellers on the passage of the bill. I think we can get a quorum more quickly that way than by calling the roll. No matter which way the vote results it will develop a quorum.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BORLAND. Where the House is dividing, and it develops that there is no quorum present and the point of no quorum is made, does not that automatically require a call of the House?

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. BORLAND. Then I object to interjecting any other business between the point of no quorum and the dividing of the House.

The SPEAKER. Has anybody interjected anything?

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman from Georgia has done so by asking for tellers.

Mr. ADAMSON. The Speaker counted and announced the result, and I asked for tellers on the count.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a right to tellers, if he can get enough to stand up with him.

Mr. ADAMSON. I think I can do that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia demands tellers. All in favor of ordering tellers will rise and stand until they are counted. Evidently a sufficient number, and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] will take their places as tellers. Those in favor of the passage of this bill——

Mr. BORLAND. Oh, no; Mr. Speaker, this is a count to find whether there is a quorum present or not.

The SPEAKER. Members will pass between the tellers and be counted.

Mr. BORLAND. On what question, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. On the question whether there is a quorum here or not.

The Members passed between the tellers, and the tellers reported 205 Members.

Mr. ADAMSON. There are a good many who have not gone through.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not make them go through.

Mr. ADAMSON. You can count them.

The SPEAKER. No; the Chair can not count them.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentlemen who failed to go between the tellers will not get up and confess their presence, there will have to be an automatic call of the House.

Mr. THOMAS. I did not go through, and I am here.

Mr. ADAMSON. The call of the House is automatic.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] moves that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. ADAMSON. He made that motion some time ago, and it was voted down, and there has been no business since.

The SPEAKER. It is an automatic call on the passage of the bill. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 229, nays 12, answered "present" 2, not voting 187, as follows:

VOTE ON RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I received a telegram to-day from the gentleman from West Virginia, Mr. NEELY, asking me to say to the House that if he had been here when the river and harbor bill was voted on he would have voted for the passage of the bill.

THE BELGIAN MISSION.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the proceedings during the recess of the House to-day, including the address of Baron Moncheur and the Speaker, when the House received the Belgian commission, be incorporated in their proper place in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—BEAKES AGAINST BACON (H. DOC. NO. 219).

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following letter from the Clerk of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
CLERK'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., June 27, 1917.

The SPEAKER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

SIR: I have the honor to lay before the House of Representatives the contest for a seat in the House of Representatives for the Sixty-fifth Congress of the United States for the second district, State of Michigan, Samuel W. Beakes v. Mark R. Bacon, notice of which has been filed in the office of the Clerk of the House, and also transmit herewith original testimony, papers, and documents relating thereto.

The Clerk has opened and printed the testimony in the above case. In compliance with the act approved March 2, 1897, entitled "An act relating to contested-election cases," such portions of the testimony in the above case as the parties in interest agreed upon or as seemed proper to the Clerk, after giving the requisite notices, have been printed and indexed, together with the notices of contest, and the answer thereto, and such portions of the testimony as were not printed with the original papers have been sealed up and are ready to be laid before the Committee on Elections.

Two copies of the printed testimony in the aforesaid case have been mailed the contestant and the same number to the contestee. The law in reference to the briefs of both the contestant and contestee has been complied with as far as possible upon receipt by the Clerk of said briefs.

So far as the briefs have been furnished to the Clerk, they are ready to be laid before the Committee on Elections upon the order of the House, together with a tabulated statement, which has been prepared by the Clerk, showing the number of pages of testimony and the present status of said contested-election case, and all papers in connection therewith.

Yours, respectfully, SOUTH TRIMBLE.
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. The letter, together with the accompanying documents, will be printed and referred to the Committee on Elections No. 3.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] requested me before moving to adjourn to-day to call the attention of Members to his statement made yesterday morning, that it is only after the consideration of three other bills which he named that he expects the gentleman's agreement to which he referred to go into effect, and in compliance with the further request of the gentleman I now ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I object.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 7 o'clock and 9 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, June 28, 1917, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, June 28, 1917.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we thank Thee that Thou hast given to us a place for service, and that Thou hast honored us in calling us to places where we can best serve our fellow men. We pray Thee to give to us a passion for this great work which Thou hast committed to our hands. Give to us the joy of seeing the service that we render so blessed and owned of God as that it may be of benefit to all our fellow men. Guide us this day. Give to us grace, gentleness, and brotherly kindness. Give to us unity of purpose and spirit, that this Senate may be the instrument in Thy hands for accomplishing Thy great purpose in the world. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. BRADY and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by G. F. Turner, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 1816) to amend the act to regulate commerce, as amended, and for other purposes, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from Painters' Local Union No. 47, of Indianapolis, Ind., praying for the passage of the so-called Lever food-administration bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented telegrams in the nature of memorials from the National Retail Liquor Dealers' Association; from Joseph W. Arthur, of Philadelphia, Pa.; from W. E. Ratz, of Philadelphia, Pa.; and from the Malsters' Bureau of Statistics, representing the malting industry of the United States, of Chicago, Ill., remonstrating against the adoption of the prohibition amendments in the so-called food bill, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions of the West Philadelphia Woman's Christian Temperance Union; of the congregations of sundry churches of Madison, Wis.; of the State Fair Floral Co., of Sedalia, Mo.; of the congregation of the Washington Avenue Methodist Episcopal Church, of Pittsburgh, Pa.; of sundry citizens of Muskegon, Mich.; of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, of Warrenton, Mo.; of the American Temperance Board, of Indianapolis, Ind.; and of Mrs. Almira D. Carico, of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition from the Columbia Avenue Business Men's Association, of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for the enactment of liberal legislation relative to the prohibition of the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present two communications in the nature of memorials, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the communications were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHICAGO LAW AND ORDER LEAGUE,
Chicago, June 26, 1917.

Hon. LAWRENCE Y. SHERMAN,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SHERMAN: The information which I give in this letter to the Senate I would like very much if it could be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Yours, very truly, ARTHUR BURRAGE FARWELL,
President.

CHICAGO, September 2, 1916.

Hon. NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I received information in the last two days regarding immoral houses in El Paso. My informant, who investigated two of the red-light districts, said he saw in those districts about 250 soldiers, and that guards were stationed in the district to prevent disorder.

I appeal to you as Secretary of War, as a military necessity, to station soldiers in those districts not to prevent disorder and shooting but to prevent soldiers from going into such districts at all. I consider that for soldiers to frequent these districts is more dangerous to their lives—and especially to those of their families, their wives, and their children—than war. These evils not only destroy the body but the soul, and I certainly think it is up to you as the supreme power next to the President, and having the care of all these men, to see to it that these men are not destroyed by these terrible diseases and by the temptations that come to them away from their homes, and that their families—their wives and their children, and the wives and children of the future, their fathers and mothers and friends—shall be saved from the awful catastrophe of which they are in danger if the soldiers frequent such places.

I have been more or less active in the contest against the social evil in this city since 1894, have studied to some extent the effects of the terrible diseases incident to that evil, and the United States, by its power, takes men (and many of them young men) from their homes and puts them into camps, and then does not protect them from these terrible evils, worse than an armed force.

If you have not the power to do as I suggest, will you not take the matter up with Congress and obtain that power? Will you not also kindly answer this letter, because if there is anything that we can do here we shall be glad to do it.

I have sent a copy of this letter to President Wilson; also to Representative JAMES R. MANN (in whose district I live) and to the two Senators from the State of Illinois.

Yours, very truly, ARTHUR BURRAGE FARWELL,
President.

CHICAGO, April 10, 1917.

Hon. NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In the March number of the Social Hygiene Bulletin, published by the American Society of Social Hygiene, 105 West Fortieth Street, appeared the following:

"In the New York division we had 19,000 officers and men on the border. By careful moral prophylaxis and the rigid enforcement of a regulation prohibiting officers and men from using or having in their possession beer or liquor in any form, this unit made a record of freedom from venereal infection that probably has never been approached in the history of our Army. In the period of five months we had less than 20 cases of venereal infection. Rigid inspections were made regularly to insure prompt detection of such cases. Immediately upon the arrival of the division guards were posted over houses of prostitution, and no soldiers were allowed to visit such places. Within three weeks after our arrival the last of those places had been driven from our sector, so that the sector was free from prostitution. In like manner the front and rear entrances to every saloon were posted with sentinels. In the absence of the most rigid discipline young men are likely to fall victims to temptation leading to the contraction of venereal diseases. When such discipline does not obtain the noneffective rate grows."

I would like to inquire if Maj. Gen. O'Ryan could do what he did to prevent his soldiers going into houses of ill-repute and into saloons, could not every commanding officer in the Army do the same?

On last Saturday a woman came into our office who had just come from the West. She said as her train came to a town in New Mexico 18 or 20 soldiers got aboard, some of them drunk. The porter came through the train cursing and saying that he had to make up berths for those drunken soldiers, and remarked, "What kind of soldiers will they make?"

In view of the dangers ahead for America, would it not be possible for the War Department, as a military necessity, to advocate a bone-dry Nation, thus doing two things—removing one of the worst temptations from the soldiers and saving to the Nation at least $2,000,000,000 of money that is worse than wasted?

I shall be glad to know if it is not possible of every commanding officer to do what Maj. Gen. O'Ryan is reported to have done.

Yours, very truly,
ARTHUR BURRAGE FARWELL,
President.

HYDE PARK PROTECTIVE ASSOCIATION,
Chicago, June 26, 1917.

To the honorable the SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
Care of Hon. LAWRENCE Y. SHERMAN,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: I noticed by the public press that the House of Representatives have passed what is called a "bone-dry" prohibition measure and that an effort is being made to influence the Senate to eliminate from that bill beer and wine.

Perhaps some of our experiences may throw some light upon the methods of the brewers in the city of Chicago.

I beg to say that I have been interested, more or less, in public matters in Chicago since 1869, and since 1873 have been contending for total abstinence. I started to sell goods on the road in 1871. It was customary at that time to treat customers to intoxicating liquor. In 1873 I signed the pledge at a Woman's Christian Temperance Union meeting in Appleton, Wis. These women were very strict in their pledge; it included cider, and I have not drank a glass of cider since 1873. I sold goods on the road and in Chicago for 37 years and I know the temptations that come to a man when he is away from home selling goods. I have seen in my experience some of the best salesmen that Chicago has known go down through drink, gambling, and bad women, and these three evils usually are associated together.

Since 1873 have been contending for the upholding of the law of Illinois which provides that saloons shall be closed on Sunday, and for nearly 27 years have been associated with the Hyde Park Protective Association, which has fought with more or less success against saloons, "blind pigs," gambling and houses of ill repute, and road houses in that section of Chicago known as Hyde Park, which contains about one-quarter of the total area of Chicago. We have been responsible for carrying 11 cases to the supreme court of this State, 10 of which have been won, and I believe that the worst elements that we have had to contend with has not been the saloon keeper, "blind-pig" keeper, gambler, and keepers of houses of ill repute but the brewers.

One of the worst "blind-pig" keepers whom we put out of business was a man by the name of Burgeson. He turned over to us his bills from the McAvoy Brewing Co., and our attorney and myself urged the president of that company, Mr. Adam Ortseifen, to refuse to sell the products of his brewery in the prohibition districts of Hyde Park. We showed him these bills from his own brewery to this man Burgeson. Burgeson's address was 4438 Cottage Grove Avenue, in the barn in the rear, and instead of putting the address upon the bills and the number of the street they simply put it Cottage Grove Avenue, and that street is about 7 miles long. Mr. Ortseifen said to us, "We are manufacturers and we sell to anybody." During the World's Fair the barn of our president was burned, and I believe an attempt was made to burn his house. The president who succeeded him was president of a bank, and that bank lost three brewers' accounts because its president was also the president of the Hyde Park Protective Association. I was thrown out of the shoe business, after I had been in it for 31 years, on account, as I believe, of my work in Hyde Park. I understand the managers of a certain brewery that we had helped to block from putting in a saloon at Fifty-first and Prairie Avenue tried to get a resolution through the Chicago and Milwaukee Brewers' Association that if the firm I was with did not discharge me they would boycott that firm. I went to the head of the house. He said there was nothing in it; but in six months I lost my job, and I had been with that man as a brother salesman or employee for 31 years.

In the Chicago Law and Order League we investigated 11 of the worst saloons, 10 of which were in the old red-light district at Twenty-second Street in Chicago and the eleventh just outside of that district, and in every case we found the bondsmen of these saloon keepers to be brewers or their employees.

From my long experience in making contests for nearly half of a century, I believe there is no force that has in the past done so much damage to the city, the State, and the Nation as the brewers. I believe that the worst traitors that the Nation has are those who manufacure an article that destroys men, women, and children; that is linked up with liquor and vice, and to-day this Nation is in greater danger from liquor and vice than from war. (See copies of letters to Secretary of War Baker of Sept. 2, 1916, and Apr. 10, 1917; also article and pictures in the Survey for June 9, 1917, regarding saloons and houses of ill repute at El Paso, Tex., and document written by M. J. Exner, M. D., re prostitution in relation to the Army on the Mexican border, attached.)

I trust that no consideration will be given to the plea of the brewers. They do not come into court with clean hands.

I beg to remain,
Yours, very truly,
ARTHUR BURRAGE FARWELL,
Secretary Hyde Park Protective Association,
President Chicago Law and Order League.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, I present a memorial adopted by the faculty of the University of Idaho at a meeting held at Moscow, Idaho. This memorial most earnestly urges that all practicable measures be taken by the Government, civil and military, national, State, and municipal, to remove from the neighborhood of military camps and naval stations the temptations offered by the saloon and commercialized vice where such conditions are present.

I may say that the State of Idaho is what is called bone dry. We have a constitutional amendment which prohibits the use of intoxicating liquors in any form. Our University of Idaho has furnished as large a per cent of volunteers in this war as any other university, and the faculty feel, the citizens of Idaho feel, and those who represent the State of Idaho in Congress feel that our boys should not be subjected to the temptations always caused by the liquor traffic when it is so easy for us to remedy the evil. The Committee on Agriculture, of which I am a member, has reported to the Senate a bill which will do much toward correcting this unsatisfactory condition, and I hope before this Congress adjourns it will pass a bone-dry law that will prohibit the manufacture, sale, or use of intoxicating liquors in any form.

I am in hearty sympathy with the memorial adopted by the faculty of the University of Idaho. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There being no objection, the memorial was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Memorial voted by the faculty of the University of Idaho at the meeting of May 14, 1917.

Whereas students of this university have enlisted and will enlist as officers and men in the Army and Navy of the United States; and
Whereas these men will be located in training camps for several months previous to active service; and

Whereas the principle of selective draft lays upon those who adopt it a heavy responsibility for the physical and social results of conditions of Army and Navy life; and

Whereas experience has demonstrated repeatedly and abundantly the terrible effects of the saloon and of commercialized prostitution upon military efficiency, upon the public health, and upon the heredity and morals of the coming generation; and

Whereas the possibility is acknowledged of reducing the evil to a minimum through effective administrative, legislative, and military measures: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the faculty of the University of Idaho respectfully and earnestly urge that all practicable measures be taken by the Government, civil and military, National, State, and municipal, to remove from the neighborhood of military camps and naval stations the temptations offered by the saloon and commercialized vice where such conditions are present, to prevent the appearance of such conditions where they do not now exist, and to employ and encourage all suitable means of healthful recreation for officers and men; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this memorial be spread upon the minutes of this faculty, that a copy be furnished the newspapers, and that copies be sent to the President of the United States, to the Senators and Representatives of Idaho in Congress, to the Secretaries of War and of the Navy, to the Surgeon General, to the governor of California, to the mayor of San Francisco, and to the commandant at Presidio.

Mr. CULBERSON. I present sundry telegrams in the nature of petitions, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HOUSTON, TEX., June 27, 1917.

Hon. CHARLES A. CULBERSON,
Care Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.:

The action of the Senate agricultural subcommittee in leaving to President Wilson final determination of prohibition of grain in manufacture of alcoholic liquor is wise and fair to every interest concerned. This is not the time nor the occasion to put a premium on national discord, as would naturally follow in hundreds of communities if the action of the House would be followed in the Senate. There are many questions besides prohibition that would be affected if, in the judgment of the President, who is charged with responsibility for the success of our arms, it became necessary to take this drastic action. It should therefore be in his hands to make the decision, and the people of the country will indorse whatever course he takes. We urge you to support the subcommittee report; it is fair, equitable, and the wise course to pursue at this time. Our people here are intensely interested and I think all will be satisfied with amendment.

FRANK ANDREWS.

GALVESTON, TEX., June 26, 1917.

Hon. CHARLES A. CULBERSON,
Washington, D. C.:

I hope you will oppose the provision in a pending bill that would prohibit the making of beer and light wines. It would be the destruction of much business, the depreciation of property without compensation, and the throwing of many thousands out of employment. Beer is made chiefly from malt, which is made from barley, and barley is little used for food. Our allies in Europe do not resort to such measures, why should Americans do so?

JAMES B. STUBBS.

AUSTIN, TEX., June 25, 1917.

Senator C. A. CULBERSON,
Washington, D. C.:

In my judgment, placing prohibitive tax on manufacture of light wines and beer will greatly demoralize business by closing many business houses and putting many men out of employment. If you support measure to confine tax to manufacture of whisky, it will be approved by business men of this section.

GEO. W. LITTLEFIELD.

SAN ANTONIO, TEX., June 26, 1917.

Senator CHARLES A. CULBERSON,
Washington, D. C.:

We protest vigorously against that portion of food-control bill prohibiting use of grain by breweries as unnecessary and a virtual confiscation of brewery property. This is prohibition rather than conservation.

FRANZ C. GROOT,
President Chamber of Commerce.

BEAUMONT, TEX., June 26, 1917.

Hon. C. A. CULBERSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We do not think the bill to conserve food supplies accomplishes its purposes by allowing use of food products in manufacture of nonalcoholic drinks and prohibiting it in manufacture of beers and light wines. To be consistent both should be allowed or prohibited. In its present shape the bill should be defeated or amended so as to allow food products in the manufacture of beers and light wines.

BEAUMONT CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

DALLAS, TEX., June 26, 1917.

SULPHUR SPRINGS, TEX., June 27, 1917.

Hon. C. A. CULBERSON,

Your friends earnestly hope that you will use your efforts and influence to defeat the measure that undertakes to prohibit the making of beer. Your clear judgment and experience, we feel sure, can furnish the strongest arguments against it. It is a virtual destruction of property and deprivation of employment without compensation. Less than 1 per cent of the grain of the country is used for beer and that is mainly barley, which is little used for food. Our allies have not taken such steps, why should we?

These mass meetings represent an aggregate of 50,000 people present and actually voting. Their interest in the question exceeds even their interest in the war. A mass meeting of the citizens of Hagerstown held last night by rising vote unanimously directed me to urge in their name the immediate passage of the war prohibition amendment embodied in the food bill as passed by the House. The responsibility should not be shifted to the President. The American people expect you to assume it.

J. FRANK HANLY.

Mr. GRONNA. I present certain resolutions sent me by the North Dakota State Federation of Labor, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NORTH DAKOTA UNION LABOR ON WAR PROBLEMS.

North Dakota Federation of Labor in convention assembled adopted and ordered published the following expression on "Problems confronting union labor resultant upon the entry of the United States into the world war":

In peace or war the organized-labor movement of America is the articulate expression of all labors. The economic pressure of capital renders voiceless the mass of labor against unjust conditions through fear of loss of employment, and it as surely throttles free political expression through the same economic fear. Through years of industrial, commercial, civic, and political growth the organized-labor movement has functioned as spokesman for the mass of labor, and must so function through tae stirring moments of our national life and in years to come. In this serious hour, when our Government has committed our people to actual warfare against another nation, it is imperative that the organized-labor movement give voice to the feelings, the hopes and aspirations, the patriotism, and loyalty that at all times actuates the mass of American labor, whether in war or at peace.

Since it has been decreed that this Nation must become an active participant in the world war, we regard it as fortunate that the President of the United States in his war recommendation to Congress declared the high principles that should be our guiding motive for drawing the sword to be "that we have no selfish ends to serve; that we desire no conquest; that we seek no indemnities; that we wish no material compensation for the sacrifices we shall freely make; and that purpose to further the movement of democracy in the autocratically ruled nations of Europe."

In this hour of national peril labor wishes no misunderstanding to exist as to its deep-seated convictions, no doubt of its loyalty, no aspersion of its motives, and to the end that the high-minded sentiments expressed in the foregoing may be the guiding spirit of the American people in the prosecution of the war, organized labor of the State of Washington declares for the following policy and program:

First. Speculation in foodstuffs by individuals and corporations must cease. To make extortionate profit out of food supplies is criminally wrong in time of peace; it is treason in time of war. We insist on Federal supervision and distribution of food products; the elimination of the food speculator. As a necessary step toward this end we believe it to be of the first importance that the National Government immediately take possession of all means of transportation and communication.

Second. While we commend the patriotic action of some employing firms and corporations in proposing to pay their employees who enlist the difference between the Government wage for soldiers and their pay as civilian employees, we are positive that this is a crude and humiliating makeshift and will never solve the problem. We believe that such a solution can be found only in the passage of laws guaranteeing to enlisted men pay sufficient to put them on an economic equality with governmental employees in civil service.

Third. Bonds already voted by Congress to carry on the war constitute a sum so stupendous as to be almost inconceivable and impose a burden of taxation never before equaled in this country. In order that this burden may be borne by that portion of society best able to bear it we take the position that it should be raised by a graduated income tax on all incomes in excess of that necessary for the support of families. We further insist that all profits of firms, corporations, and copartnerships be appropriated by the Government to help meet the tremendous expenses of the war.

Fourth. In order that the productive power of the Nation may be developed to its highest state of efficiency it is necessary that labor be well treated and labor disturbances reduced to a minimum. As necessary to that accomplishment we urge tolerance and forbearance on the part of both employers and employees in the making and maintenance of working conditions. There can not be the highest standard of efficiency necessary to high productivity unless labor feels a sense of justice in its relations with capital. We therefore urge that employers and employees in presenting changes in working conditions employ to its fullest extent the medium of negotiation. With the extensive machinery of conciliation and mediation of both State and Nation subject to the call of either side we can not but feel that a sense of fairness exercised by both sides may entirely prevent any rupture of industrial relations. We urge the full recognition of labor in all councils of war preparation and national defense and in the working out of all the manifold problems war will entail.

Fifth. We as a body are opposed to the old form of military conscription, but we heartily indorse the selective draft as put forth by President Wilson and labor leaders throughout the country.

Sixth. We urge upon all our people a spirit of tolerance and forbearance toward those of foreign birth or ancestry within our borders. We believe that those who would conspire against our Government, of whatever nationality, should be severely dealt with, but call attention to the fact that the great majority of those of foreign birth within our country are home-loving, law-abiding, and God-fearing, loyal to the country of their adoption, to its flag, and to its institutions. Let us never forget we are fighting autocratic institutions, but have no quarrel with the people of any nation because of their accident of birth. Let us not lose our perspective nor allow the war tide to foment a spirit of race hatred and intolerance.

Seventh. We are unalterably opposed to the organization of military or semimilitary bodies ostensibly with patriotic motives, but in reality strike-breaking agencies, with a view of securing authority from the Government for their activities. No organizations of the above character should be tolerated without the sanction of either the State or Federal authority.

Eighth. The organized-labor movement is essentially democratic in its ideals and aspirations. It has been a potent force in every movement for the betterment of humanity. Changing in form, it is changeless in principle and purpose. The ideals of democracy are the ideals of labor, and in war no less than in peace the labor movement pledges its men and its resources to uphold those ideals.

RESOLUTION ON LOYALTY.

The highest authority in the American labor movement, the American Federation of Labor, has taken counsel of a number of its leaders of thought and action and has pointed out the duties of its adherents in the present tragical period of our country's life. Seeing clearly the trend of events, the executive council of the American Federation of Labor called the officers of all the national and international unions affiliated with the federation, the officers of its various departments, and the representatives of the four great railroad brotherhoods into a conference on the situation. The conference was held in Washington, D. C., on Monday, March 12, 1917, and at the conclusion of its labors had promulgated a declaration of the principles which should govern the organized-labor movement and the course of action it should follow at the time of extreme trial. This conference repeated the democratic ideals of the masses of our population and gave voice to the faith of those masses. It declared its unrelenting opposition to all forms of autocracy, whether those of the crowned and annointed despots who wield governmental power in foreign lands or those of the gilded magnet who seek to exercise industrial despotism in our own land. It declared labor's abhorrence of war and its hope that such a dire calamity might be avoided for our people, and that they might be permitted to continue cultivating and developing the arts of peace, human brotherhood, and a higher civilization.

But, fearing the worst, the men in conference wrote in its epoch-making document the solemn and binding covenant, "We hereby pledge ourselves, in peace or in war, in stress or in storm, to stand unreservedly by the standards of liberty and the safety and preservation of the institution and ideals of our liberty," and they closed it with this stirring call to duty, with the side of liberty and justice herein declared as the indispensable basis for inalienable policies: "We offer our service to our country in every field of activity to defend, safeguard, and preserve the Republic of the United States of America against the enemies, whomsoever they may be, and would call upon our fellow workers and fellow citizens, in the holy name of labor, justice, freedom, and humanity, to devotedly and patriotically give like services."

In accordance with this action and response to this call, the North Dakota State Federation of Labor in convention assembled this 3d day of June, 1917, hereby pledges its absolute and unconditional loyalty to the Government of the United States and its determination to stand by and support that Government with all the power and resources at the command of the federation to the end of the war that has been forced upon this country against the wishes of its people by the intolerable aggression of a heartless foreign autocracy.

Mr. GRONNA. I also have resolutions adopted by the National Consumers' League at a meeting in the city of New York, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NATIONAL CONSUMERS' LEAGUE RESOLUTION ON GRAIN SAVING.

PREAMBLE.

The high cost of living has already reduced the vitality, and, therefore, the working ability of large numbers of ill-paid workers, especially in the industrial centers. Economy of all kinds, particularly in preventing the waste of food, is recommended by President Wilson and members of the Cabinet, and in the hope of increasing the harvest several States have released boys and girls from school attendance to engage in agriculture. The number of children thus to be transferred from school to labor is estimated by Commissioner of Education John H. Finley at 50,000 in New York State alone.

For high school boys who will later go to college such an experience may be a reasonable war-time service. But for lads who, at best, must leave school at the seventh grade or below, the loss of two months in the spring and in the fall this year and next is irreparable. Especially for children not born to the English language, every shortening of the school year is an injury and a sacrifice.

A vast acreage is annually planted with corn, barley, rice, rye, sugar, and hops for use in preparing beverages which have notoriously trivial food value, if indeed they have any value. These crops are raised in the "dry" States as well as in the "wet" ones, and the farmer ordinarily has no means of foreseeing the final use to be made of them. Boys excused from school may, therefore, in all States alike, be—in the end—neither serving our Army and Navy, nor the starving millions abroad, nor contributing to reduce our own cost of living. Instead we may be sacrificing their school life to produce raw materials for the profits of brewers, distillers, and saloon keepers.

In the current discussion of grain saving by means of a Federal law prohibiting or reducing the output of alcoholic beverages certain subsidiary wastes are commonly overlooked. These follow after the initial waste of farm land, farm labor of men, boys, and horses, and the use of tractors, plows, thrashers, and other farm machinery.

THE WASTE OF MAN POWER.

The labor of able-bodied men is spent as brewers, distillers, maltsters, and barkeepers, and as drivers and chauffeurs of motor trucks. Considerable numbers of men work in transporting by trains and boats the crops and the finished products.

Both men and boys are occupied in the manufacture of glass bottles, drinking glasses, mugs, and other bar fixtures. It has increased in recent years following the invention of bottle-blowing machines. The waste of the children is indeed a cruel one. No more wretched employment is open to young boys than that in the glass bottle industry. The little fellows employed are not eligible to become apprentices and subsequently skilled workers in the glass industry. Theirs is a "dead end" employment.

TRAFFIC CONGESTION.

The manufacture of brandy, whisky, and beer for beverages increases traffic congestion. The grain is first carried in bulk to be brewed or distilled and later is distributed in liquid form in hogsheads, barrels, and bottles. The shipment of bottles, whether filled or empty, occupies car space for boxes and crates, and because of the size of the industry this is, in the present congested state of the railroads, a serious burden. Grain milled, barreled, and shipped as flour occupies much less space than the same amount transformed into fluid in bottles and crates, and obviously serves a more useful purpose. Draft horses, drays, and motor trucks could also be promptly put to productive uses in transporting valuable foods.

WASTE OF REAL ESTATE.

Finally, breweries, distilleries, and saloons now wastefully occupy a large total area of costly land in cities which could, in the present emergency, be used for preparing and distributing supplies.

CONCLUSION.

So long as Congress defers stopping these multiple wastes of man power, child labor, agricultural acreage, city real estate, motors and horse vehicles, transportation by trains and boats, what hope is there that serious heed will be given by citizens to requests for personal economy? If the threat of international famine is such that this new, authorized, legalized increase in child labor is inevitable, and children must be called from school, the duty of Congress to stop these wastes is correspondingly urgent.

For these reasons be it

Resolved, That the National Consumers' League executive committee, at its regular quarterly meeting held in New York City on May 11, 1917, urges upon Congress the need of prohibiting the use of grain for beverages during the period of the war.

NATIONAL CONSUMERS' LEAGUE,

Mr. GRONNA. I submit resolutions adopted by Lodge No. 2, International Association of Machinists, at Devils Lake, N. Dak., which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEVILS LAKE LODGE, No. 2,
INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF MACHINISTS,
Devils Lake, N. Dak., June 18, 1917.

Senator A. J. GRONNA,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I was instructed by Devils Lake Lodge, No. 2, International Association of Machinists, to write to you and protest against the admission of alien laborers to the United States during the war, especially Mexican, Chinese, and Japanese, and requesting you to use your influence to prevent the same.

Yours, truly,

EDW. BAIRD,
Recording Secretary, Box 60, Devils Lake, N. Dak.

Mr. GRONNA. I present resolutions adopted by the North Dakota Branch of the World's Purity Federation, in State convention assembled, at Fargo, N. Dak., which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NORTH DAKOTA ENFORCEMENT LEAGUE,
Bismarck, N. Dak., June 21, 1917.

Senator A. J. GRONNA,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have been instructed to send you the inclosed resolution passed by the North Dakota Branch of the World's Purity Federation.

The people of North Dakota are very much interested in national prohibition as a war measure.

Yours, truly,

F. L. WATKINS, Superintendent.

Resolution.

We, the delegates of the North Dakota Branch of the World's Purity Federation, in State convention assembled, at Fargo, this 19th day of June, 1917, express it as our conviction that Congress should at this session pass the measure adopting national prohibition as a war measure, and thus conserve all grain and food products to the use of prosecuting the war, safeguard our sons at the front against the dangers of intoxicating liquor, and the Nation against the inefficiency caused by the liquor traffic.

We urge our Senators and Representatives in Congress to work and vote for such a measure.

Respectfully submitted.

RALPH T. FULTON, President.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask that two telegrams be read. They are both from New York; one from Mr. Penny and the other from Mr. Stokes.

There being no objection, the telegrams were read, as follows:

SCHENECTADY, N. Y., June 27, 1917.

Senator GRONNA,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Mass meeting of citizens here to-night demand that Lever food bill shall include beer as well as whisky, and further that liquor in bond shall become commandeered for munition alcohol. This telegram is signed by 464 citizens.

R. C. PENNY, Chairman.

NEW YORK, N. Y., June 27, 1917.

Senator A. J. GRONNA,
Washington, D. C.:

Respectfully urge total prohibition during war of use of foodstuffs to make intoxicating beverages, and authority to President to use alcohol in existing liquors for war purposes.

J. G. PHELPS STOKES.

Mr. GRONNA presented a petition of the Switchmen's Union of North America, praying for the passage of the so-called Lever food bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Mott, N. Dak., praying for the prohibition of the sale of liquor for beverage purposes, to conserve facilities and efficiency of the people, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I present a petition very numerously signed by members and friends of the First Congregational Church and Sunday School of St. Petersburg, Fla., urging legislation during the present session of Congress to prohibt hereafter the manufacture and sale of all kinds of alcoholic beverages, including beer and wine, while the war in which this Nation is engaged shall last. I ask that the petition, without the signatures, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the petition was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ST. PETERSBURG, FLA., June 23, 1917.

Hon. PARK TRAMMELL,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR TRAMMELL: We, members and friends of the First Congregational Church and Sunday School of St. Petersburg, Fla., unitedly and severally most respectfully urge you to exert your influence to secure legislation during the present session of the Congress of the United States to prohibit both the manufacture and sale of all kinds of alcoholic beverages, including beer and wine, while the war in which this Nation is engaged shall last.

It is our earnest wish that you, as our representative in the Senate, will personally and vigorously advocate the passage of such a bill, and that you will vote for the same.

The reasons for such legislation are so obvious that we need not rehearse them to you. They abound wherever we look.

Respectfully submitted.

REV. C. E. HARRINGTON
(And others).

Mr. KENYON. I present a petition from the employees of the post office at Des Moines, Iowa, expressing their desire to have excessive incomes conscripted during the war. I ask that the petition and the first name be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the petition was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

We, the employees of the Des Moines post office, have each purchased a liberty loan bond, to be doing our "bit" toward financing the war. We deplore the fact that the meager salaries paid postal workers will permit of no larger contributions to that fund.

Owing to the constant increase in the cost of living, the raising of the money in a great many cases means considerable sacrifice on our part; yet we want to do our part.

We realize, however, that no sacrifice made by us is equal to that being made by those who have enlisted or those who are being conscripted to fight the battles on which so much depends.

We therefore petition you as a representative of the State of Iowa, and in so petitioning we feel that we are asking nothing more than is fair and right when we ask that you use your utmost endeavor to have conscripted at once all incomes of individuals in excess of $10,000 per annum. If life can be conscripted, we insist that incomes should not be exempt. If we are to fight for democracy, let it be all along the line.

C. C. MCGREW
(And others).

Mr. KENYON. I present a telegram, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DES MOINES, IOWA, June 26, 1917.

Hon. W. S. KENYON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

I have positive information that idle distilleries are being put into operation and running distilleries are increasing their output to mash an extra half million bushels of grain per day from now until the proposed increased tax goes into effect.

You can prevent the waste of from 10,000,000 to 20,000,000 bushels of grain by publicly announcing that you will present an amendment making the increased tax effective on all grains unused after July 1. They will not take chance on the increased tax after a public warning. Please read this to Senator OWEN.

E. T. MEREDITH.

Mr. KENYON. I give this public notice, that I shall offer such amendment as Mr. Meredith suggests.

Mr. WARREN. I have some 25 or 30 telegrams from the same locality, protesting against the prohibition of the manufacture of beer. As they represent the owners, foremen, managers, inspectors, and so forth, of large manufacturing concerns, I ask that the subject matter of one of the dispatches be printed in the RECORD, and all of the names of the signers.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Telegram.]

WATERBURY, CONN.

Hon. FRANCIS E. WARREN,
United States Senate:

Many of your friends depend upon the defeat of this liquor amendment for their support, and we look to you for its defeat.

David Applebee, mechanical engineer; G. H. Fauser, oxy-acetylene engineer; Thomas J. McGrath, manufacturer of cigars; Joseph Champagne, foreman of Blake & Johnson Co.; William A. Donahue, foreman Scoville Manufacturing Co.; Cornelius Callahan, ammunition inspector; M. C. Spied, superintendent American Pin Co.; Edward J. Brennan, construction foreman; Charles B. Schenmehl, president Waterbury Battery Co.; Albert Schumaker, president Waterbury Lumber & Coal Co.; Charles Fitzpatrick, Scoville Manufacturing Co.; P. S. Bannon, general superintendent, Farrell Foundry & Machine Co.; Thomas A. Donahue, merchant; James Barry, foreman Automatic Machine Co.; William Glasby, foreman; Eugene Casey, ammunition inspector; J. Sharp, foreman; M. Heulbery, superintendent, Henely Construction Co.; John A. Sayers; Patrick Malone, merchant; M. Brown, construction foreman; and John Schmidt.

Mr. WARREN. I also present a dispatch from Green River, Wyo., which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GREEN RIVER, WYO., June 27, 1917.

Senator F. E. WARREN,
Washington, D. C.:

Resolution passed by Green River Union Brewery Workers to petition you to protest against any prohibition of beers and wines in any bill that may come before you for consideration.

RICHARD CHANNEY, Secretary.

Mr. KING. I send to the desk three telegrams, which are typical of a large number which I have received from labor organizations and other bodies of workmen in favor of the Lever food bill, so called. I ask that the telegrams be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PARK CITY, UTAH, June 23, 1917.

Hon. WILLIAM H. KING,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Park City Miners' Union, No. 144, in convention assembled, unanimously and earnestly beg your active support of the Lever food-administration bill. Under the existing conditions of our country we consider it a national necessity that this bill be on the statute books before July 1.

W. T. QUINN, Secretary.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH, June 27, 1917.

Hon. W. H. KING,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

By direction of the joint general committee of the Order of Railway Conductors and Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen, representing 1,500 conductors, brakemen and yard men on the Oregon Short Line, we urge you to support the immediate passage of the food-control bill now before the United States Senate.

J. C. CLARK,
Order of Railway Conductors.
J. C. DAVIS,
Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., June 27, 1917.

Hon. WILLIAM H. KING,
Washington, D. C.:

Seventy-five representatives of the general committee of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, Order of Railroad Conductors, and Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, representing 8,500 engineers, conductors, firemen, and brakemen employed on the Southern Pacific lines in California, Oregon, Arizona, Nevada, Utah, and Texas, are now in session in this city and have unanimously approved the food-control bill, S. 2462. Representatives residing in Utah are in hearty accord with our general committee resolution and respectfully request full support to the above bill. Prompt action is imperative in order to protect the working people of the Nation.

A. MILLER,
Order of Railroad Conductors.
P. E. DAVIS,
Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers.
G. W. CULVER,
Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen.
C. B. DOTY,
Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen.

Mr. RANSDELL. I present a memorial of the Louisiana League for Woman Suffrage, urging Congress to pass the Susan B. Anthony amendment to the Constitution as a war measure. I ask that the memorial be printed in the RECORD. It is very brief.

There being no objection, the memorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas we women of the South are being called upon for service and for sacrifice in war, and are responding to the call with true nobility of spirit and purpose; and

Whereas we realize how unjust it is that we are discriminated against, as are women from many other sections of our country, merely on account of sex: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we women of the Louisiana League for Woman Suffrage, meeting this 18th day of June, 1917, at New Orleans, call upon our President and the Congress of the United States to cause to be passed quickly as a war measure the Susan B. Anthony amendment allowing the States themselves to pass upon the measure so that the women of the Nation may feel themselves part of our great country in its time of greatest stress, and in a position to protect their children, their homes, and themselves in the event of their men being called away in great numbers; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be sent to the President of the United States, to the party leaders in both Houses of Congress, and to the Louisiana delegation, with the request to Senator JOSEPH E. RANSDELL that they be read into the RECORD of the Senate and to Representative GARLAND DUPRÉ that they be read into the RECORD of the House; and be it finally

Resolved, That the Louisiana Members of the United States Senate and National House be urged to do all in their power to have the amendment passed immediately as a war measure.

Mrs. W. J. O'DONNELL,
President Louisiana League for Woman Suffrage.

Mr. JAMES. I present resolutions indorsed at the June meeting of the Louisville Clericus, representing the Episcopal ministers, Cathedral House, Louisville, Ky., which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LOUISVILLE, KY., June 25, 1917.

HON. OLLIE M. JAMES,
United States Senator from Kentucky,
The Parkwood, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: The following resolutions were indorsed at the June meeting of the Louisville Clericus, representing the Episcopal ministers of this vicinity:

"Whereas fuel conditions, especially in the Louisville district, are a menace to public welfare which unless speedily remedied will result in immeasurable suffering, disease, and death; and

"Whereas there is now pending in the Senate a law designed to regulate the production and distribution of necessities (material) including fuel; and

"Whereas Government control of said necessities is essential, alike to the successful prosecution of this present foreign war and to the protection of our people at home: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the Louisville Clericus does hereby join heartily in supporting this needed legislation: and be it further

"Resolved, That we call upon our Senators and Representatives in Congress assembled, to bring all their influence to the enactment of this law; and to be especially vigilant in guarding against amendments contrary to the common good."

Assured that your record as a strong supporter of the administration will be upheld in this instance, and with all good will, we remain,

Respectfully, yours,

EDW. C. MCALLISTER,
Secretary Louisville Clericus.

Mr. GALLINGER presented a petition of Local Branch No. 59, Paving Cutters' Union of the United States and Canada, of West Concord, N. H., praying for the passage of the so-called food-control bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions of the Woman's Home Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Portsmouth, of Fred. H. Keyser, of Henniker; of 32 members of Fitzwilliam Grange, Patrons of Husbandry; and of 166 students of the New Hampshire College of Agriculture and Mechanic Arts, of Durham, all in the State of New Hampshire, praying for national prohibition, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of the congregation of the First Methodist Episcopal Church, of Sycamore, Ill., praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I wish to give notice that as soon as the routine morning business is concluded I shall call up Senate bill 1533, known as the migratory-bird bill.

LABOR PERILS.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I am in receipt of information chiefly by correspondence from different parts of the far West calling attention to a situation which is sufficiently grave both in its present condition and in its menace to some of our vital industries to justify me in calling the attention of the Senate and of the public to it.

The subject is tersely and graphically presented by a letter from Nevada, which I received yesterday afternoon and which I will read, omitting the names of the writer and of certain individuals which appear in the body of the letter. It is dated the 22d day of June, 1917, and is addressed to myself:

For the past several weeks the I. W. W. has been getting very active in the West, starting first in Arizona, and now their activities seem to be concentrated upon Butte. Yesterday a number of Austrians who sympathize with that organization walked out at Ely, and I understand there is likely to be trouble there. It seems they have been attempting to close down the mines and stop the production of materials that would be necessary to conduct the war.

A radical I. W. W. who was one of the instigators of the Goldfield trouble in early days, has recently come into this State from Arizona, going to Goldfield, then to Tonapah, and winding up in Ely. They also have sent a number of other agitators to our Nevada camps and have attempted vigorously to organize the I. W. W. in each and every one of them. They are sending out the vilest kind of literature, showing that they are not in accord with the Government or with war policies; that they are against conscription and war in general. They are extending their influences as far as possible to the Austrian and German sympathizers, as well as trying to get in as many ignorant and disgruntled members as they can. Tonapah and Goldfield are cooperating in this matter and frankly we expect trouble.

We are operating a mine in Arizona called the Montana Mines Co., located at Ruby, and there we are having serious difficulty in securing labor on account of the Mexicans not being able to cross the line. We are likewise operating a mine called the Boundary Red Mountain Mining Co., in the State of Washington, nearly on the border and near Sardis, British Columbia. On account of recent developments we are unable to get men from British Columbia for this property, and it is impossible to get them on this side; consequently we have had to close down a good producing mine, as it has been impossible to keep laborers there.

The I. W. W. agitators are doing everything in their power at Seattle to prevent the farmers from securing labor to put up their crops, and they are doing the same in California, where a great deal of the fruit and vegetable crop will spoil on account of the shortage of labor, as well as the shortage of cans for packing purposes.

I thought that you should be apprised of this situation, which is really becoming acute, as it may be possible for you in some manner to afford us some relief in these matters.

This letter, Mr. President, comes from a very thoughtful gentleman, a conservative business and mining man, who is not given to hysteria or easily stampeded by any unexpected situation.

There are large industrial difficulties and very serious ones in the mines at Butte, in Utah, in Arizona, and, to some degree, in my own State, and in each instance the prime cause of the trouble seems to be identical. It proceeds from the activities of an organization that is a libel upon labor unions and whose professed doctrines are murder, anarchy, and the destruction of modern society.

I have no doubt, Mr. President, that they are operating with the active sympathy, if not under the express direction, of influences in this country devoted to the cause of our enemies and serving them to the best of their ability.

There can be no question about the effect upon this war of the protracted suspension of work in our mines and smelters, those great institutions from which come the raw material of modern warfare, and without which no nation, and, least of all, ours, can play its part in the great drama now in progress.

Mr. President, I think that the attention of the press, of the governors of our States, of the Department of Justice, and of the other departments of the Government should be riveted to the grave peril which this condition involves. To what extent investigations have gone or are going, whether this conspiracy, as I believe it is, is being unearthed or will be unearthed, I am not informed. In my judgment here is presented a situation that demands immediate summary and radical treatment. Halfway measures may accomplish little. We might just as well attempt to compromise with a nest of rattlesnakes as with the leaders of this anarchistic organization, who flourish most when society is most disturbed. I hope that the Government will mobilize all its agencies, if it has not already done so, and put an end to these conspiracies, that there may not be war and destruction behind our backs, no such cause of disintegration in our rear, while we are discharging our duty to ourselves and our allies on the front.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. SHEPPARD. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (S. 2434) authorizing the counties of Cass and Itasca, Minn., to construct a bridge across the Mississsippi River between said counties, and I submit a report (No. 72) thereon. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BROUSSARD:

A bill (S. 2524) for the relief of Isaac C. Johnson, jr.; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. GRONNA:

A bill (S. 2525) granting a pension to Daniel Stahler; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. KING:

A bill (S. 2526) to prohibit interstate commerce in beverage liquors containing alcohol; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

A bill (S. 2527) authorizing the appointment of chaplains at large for the United States Army; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AERIAL NAVIGATION.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I ask leave to introduce a joint resolution, and I wish to make a very brief statement in connection with it.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 82) providing for the creation of a commission on aerial navigation was read twice by its title.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, England is said to be planning a permanent peace air service, with a personnel of 160,000 officers and men, which is larger than the United States Navy at full war strength.

It has been recently reported upon reliable authority that France has appointed a commission for the purpose of determining the commercial opportunities of aircraft in spite of the fact that she is said to be "exhausted" in the defense of her western front against invasion by Germany.

Germany is said to be perfecting arrangements for aerial commercial service to operate between Berlin and various points of the German Empire, and a few days ago it was reported in a public address that rules and regulations and tariff rates had been adopted and promulgated, and it is claimed that perishable foods are transported by means of dirigibles in Germany at the present time.

The Italian Government has also just given permission for the establishment of daily aerial mail service between Rome and Turin, with postage at the Italian equivalent of 5 cents per letter.

I desire to say that Representative HULBERT, of New York, has introduced in the House of Representatives a measure similar to this.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

NATIONAL DEFENSE.

Mr. SUTHERLAND submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1786) for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO PENDING BILL.

Mr. McCUMBER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 4961) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 4961) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

AMENDMENT OF INTERSTATE-COMMERCE ACT.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1816) to amend the act to regulate commerce, as amended, and for other purposes.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House, request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. NEWLANDS, Mr. ROBINSON, and Mr. CUMMINS conferees on the part of the Senate.

NEWS-PRINT PAPER INQUIRY.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to call up Senate resolution No. 95, which was submitted by me on yesterday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over under the rule from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read Senate resolution 95.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I ask that the further reading of the resolution may be dispensed with.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution has been once read.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I think the resolution ought to be read at length. I am somewhat interested in the subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire requests the reading of the resolution, and the reading will be resumed by the Secretary.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the resolution, which is as follows:

Whereas pursuant to the resolution the United States Senate of April 24, 1916, the Federal Trade Commission began the investigation of the combination existing among the manufacturers of news print paper; and

Whereas two reports have been made to the Senate by said commission, dated, respectively, March 3, 1917, and June 13, 1917; and

Whereas said commission finds as a fact and reports that there exists a combination of paper manufacturers which extorts unreasonable prices, and that by reason of said combination free competition has been restricted, and that within the past year prices have been advanced to large consumers as much as $50 per ton, and to small consumers in some cases as much as $180 per ton; and

Whereas said commission has reported that by concerted action said combination of manufacturers has discouraged the production of print paper, and has arbitrarily divided customers and territories among themselves and thus limited and controlled competition; and

Whereas said commission has further found and reported that because of said unfair and illegal practices, small publishers have already been driven out of business, that more are likely to suffer the same fate, that large publishers will be financially ruined, and other rendered unable to make any profits from their legitimate business ventures; and

Whereas all of said acts and practices are in violation of the laws of the United States prohibiting monopolies, restraints of trade, unfair practices, and so forth; and

Whereas the Government of the United States is a large consumer of news-print paper, and as such is the victim of the illegal combination, practices, and extortions aforesaid; and

Whereas the Federal Trade Commission in its report of June 13, 1917, expressly states that "the efforts of the commission to restore competitive conditions have failed," and the said illegal and oppressive practices are being continued: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Federal Trade Commission is hereby directed to inform the Senate of the United States, with all due dispatch, why it has not issued and caused to be served upon the offending persons and corporations aforesaid appropriate orders commanding them to desist from the said illegal and unfair practices to the end that the same shall be discontinued, and if not, that appropriate proceedings may be had in the courts of the United States to enforce said orders of the commission.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, while I do not intend to oppose the passage of this resolution, I do not desire to be understood as concurring in all of the recitals of facts which are contained in its preamble. The resolution contains a somewhat lengthy preamble, reciting in part the history of the proceedings of the Federal Trade Commission relating to the news-print paper industry. It is a fact, in my judgment—and I think the investigation before the Federal Trade Commission justifies that conclusion—that a number of persons and corporations engaged in the manufacture of news-print paper in the United States have so conducted their business as to violate the Sherman Antitrust Act and to cause an enormous increase in the price of this very useful and, indeed, indispensable commodity.

I am of the opinion that the proceedings before the Federal Trade Commission have been very prompt and meritorious in so far as they have occurred. I do not think the Federal Trade Commission has been negligent in any particular in prosecuting this subject. Last fall an investigation of about 80 manufacturing plants engaged in the production of news-print paper in the United States and Canada was entered upon by the Federal Trade Commission. That investigation was very thorough. The information which the Trade Commission obtained was turned over to the Department of Justice. Before indictments were returned, however, a proposition was made to the commission that an arrangement be effected by which the price to be charged for news-print paper might be arbitrated, and the Federal Trade Commission, if my memory serves me correctly, suggested an arrangement whereby a charge of $2.50 a hundred might be made. That price was very much less than the price that was then being charged for print paper, and very much less than is now being charged.

Subsequent to this arrangement, which was somewhat tentative, indictments against a number of gentlemen engaged in the industry were returned in the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, the date of the return of the indictments being April 12, 1917. The indictments charged the defendants with conspiracy in restraint of trade under the Sherman Antitrust Act. After the indictments were returned and the Department of Justice was proceeding upon the evidence obtained by the Federal Trade Commission in its investigation to prosecute the defendants, the defendants rescinded the tentative agreement that had been theretofore made to the effect that the price of news-print paper might be arbitrated by the Federal Trade Commission, insisting that it was not fair for the Government agents to regulate the price of news-print paper, and at the same time pursue the matter by indictment.

It is the purpose of the Government—both of the Federal Trade Commission and of the Department of Justice, so far as I am advised—to prosecute these indictments to final judgment. Some 10 days ago a complaint was filed by Mr. Frank Walsh, an attorney representing Mr. W. R. Hearst and other large consumers of news-print paper, asking that the commission exercize its alleged power to issue an order against these defendants to cease and desist.

Upon the filing of that complaint the commission, I am advised, took up the matter with the Department of Justice with a view to determining whether, if a hearing was had upon the complaint and the order issued and the parties themselves were sworn, as would probably be necessary, immunity would result. That matter has not yet been finally determined. I apprehend that when the response is made by the Federal Trade Commission to the inquiry contained in the resolution, it will disclose that the failure to issue the order to cease and desist, or the delay in issuing it, is due to the fact that the commission anticipated that such proceeding might result in immunity to the defendants who have already been indicted, and who are now being prosecuted in the Federal court in New York.

If there is contained in this resolution the implication that the Federal Trade Commission has neglected its duty in not issuing such an order, under the circumstances as I have briefly narrated them, I wish to say that, in my judgment, that implication is unjustified and unfounded. The commission has recommended that the Federal Government take over substantially the news-print manufacturing industry and operate it during the continuance of the war. Other remedies have been suggested. At the instance of some students on the subject, I introduced a bill some weeks ago authorizing the Federal Trade Commission to fix a maximum price to be charged for news-print paper, and declaring that commodity to be affected with a public service and to be a public utility. Of course, the question as to whether or not news-print paper is a public utility is one that can not be precluded by mere legislative determination or resolution. The legislature may express its opinion that any commodity is a public utility, and, as I understand the legal aspect of the matter, the courts may give consideration to that declaration, but can not be precluded from determining that it is not a public utility.

The Federal Trade Commission, however, has recommended that, as a remedy of practical value to more than 20,000 small publishers in the United States, the Government take over this business and operate it for the present and for the immediate future. Such recommendation——

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. Just a moment. Such recommendation is very strongly opposed by some of the largest consumers of news-print paper. It is, however, according to the best information that I have, very strongly approved by some of the small consumers who are being charged the most exorbitant prices imaginable.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I now interrupt the Senator?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield now to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, just at that point I want, if I may, to suggest a correction of the thought the Senator has expressed, and it is quite a general error that people fall into. I think the Senator will see readily the distinction which the Trade Commission draws between a proposition to take over these plants and operate them by the Government and their real view, which is that they shall be operated on Government account. There is quite a distinction between taking hold of these plants and operating them by the Government, and seeing that they are operated on Government account.

Now, the recommendation the commission make is that the plants be operated on Government account, under the supervision of some agency of the Government, and particularly an agency which will have control of the distribution of the product.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the statement of fact made by the Senator from Florida is entirely correct; but I apprehend that there is little distinction in legal principle, and, as a matter of legal analysis, I do not think the distinction is of far-reaching importance. The operation of these industries upon Government acccount, while quite different, in fact, from the Government taking over the industries and either owning them or operating them, is in legal contemplation not very different.

The point that I want to make, however, is that the commission has not been inefficient; that it has not been negligent in the discharge of its duties; and that the delay in issuing the order to cease and desist, or their failure up to the present to issue that order, probably grows out of the fact that it is feared immunity will result if such a proceeding is taken.

Mr. President, I have nothing further to say.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, just a word. Let it be noticed, first, that every recitation of fact contained in the resolution is taken from the reports of the Federal Trade Commission. There is scarce a variation in the language. The substance of all that appears in the resolutions touching the operations of the manufacturers of print paper is found in the reports of the commission.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to one material difference between the recital of facts contained in the preamble and the language used in the commission's report. He may not regard it as material, but others do. The preamble purports to quote the exact language of the commission under the last "whereas," which reads as follows:

Whereas the Federal Trade Commission, in its report of June 13, 1917, expressly states that "the efforts of the commission to restore competitive conditions have failed," and the said illegal and oppressive practices are being continued.

While I can not quote from memory exactly the language of the commission in its report, as I recall the language used by it, it is different from that contained in the clause I have just read.

Mr. REED. I will read the language. In the interest of brevity I did not quote every word, but I will read what the commission say in their report. Under the heading "Failure of arbitration agreement" is found this language:

The efforts of the commission to restore competitive conditions in the news-print industry expeditiously and to arbitrate and effectively project a fair price for news-print paper have failed.

In the resolution I have abbreviated that language so that it reads:

The efforts of the commission to restore competitive conditions have failed.

I left out the words—

in the news-print industry expeditiously and to arbitrate and effectively project a fair price for news-print paper.

Of course, those words are mere surplusage, and the language I have quoted fairly presents the spirit of the report.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. I hope the Senator does not think that I implied any thought that the Senator had misrepresented.

Mr. REED. Oh, no; I know the Senator did not mean that.

Mr. ROBINSON. I merely made the statement in my remarks that I did not concur in the accuracy of all the recitals of fact. I do think there is a substantial difference in the language that he has used as affecting the efficiency of the efforts of the commission, but I recognize the fact that the matter is not of controlling importance. I merely referred to that in order that I might not be concluded by the statements of fact made in the resolution.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. REED. In one moment. I think there is no possible difference, and that if my very good friend will lay down the language of the resolution beside the language of the report of the commission, bearing in mind the point aimed at in the resolution, he will conclude that the substance of the report is fairly stated. In any event the Senate now has it, and let the Senate determine it.

Mr. President, the Senator from Arkansas makes the point that he thinks the reason the commission has not served notice upon the news-print paper men commanding them to desist their illegal practices is to be found in the fact that if such notice were served the news-print paper men would be summoned and would give their testimony, and thus might obtain immunity.

Mr. President, I can not so understand the proceedings. The commission has already investigated the questions of fact, and has already made its conclusions of fact. Having done that, whatever testimony was to be taken has already been taken; the facts have been found and solemnly recorded, and reported to the Senate. There remains, therefore, nothing for the commission to do, if its investigation has disclosed facts making it its duty to act except to issue its order commanding the news-print paper men to desist in their illegal practices. No further hearing is necessary. Therefore, no immunity can be obtained, because it is not necessary to summon any witnesses.

Let me say this in conclusion: I think there is no real opposition to this resolution. The resolution does not undertake in any way to condemn anybody. It asks a simple question. It calls upon the Trade Commission to advise the Senate why it has not taken a certain action. When the Trade Commission answers that question in its own way, it will then be for the Senate to determine whether, in the opinion of the Senate, the answer is satisfactory. As I said in my remarks yesterday, I do not say that the Trade Commission may not have a reason, but I desire to know what that reason is.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri whether it is in the RECORD that the commission have not issued any notices to these parties?

Mr. REED. It is recited in the resolution that they have not issued that notice. It is recited as a fact.

Mr. OWEN. I wanted to know what the fact was upon which that recital was based.

Mr. REED. Well, the fact is that it just is a fact; and their own reports indicate that, although they do not expressly say that they did not do it. An application has been made to them, I understand, for such an order, and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] has just made the statement that such an application was made.

Mr. OWEN. Is it in evidence before the Senate that there has been no order issued to these offending parties so far?

Mr. REED. There has been no absolute positive evidence offered, because that would imply a hearing.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield. I stated to the Senate, and I repeat it, that it is my information that no order has been issued.

Mr. REED. There is no dispute about it.

Mr. ROBINSON. A complaint was filed about 10 days ago, but the order has not been issued, for the reasons that I attempted to state a while ago.

Mr. OWEN. All that I desired was that we might not appear to charge them with neglect of duty in whatever form of resolution may be adopted when we could ascertain what the fact was without doing that by merely asking them to report what action they had taken.

Mr. REED. The language of the resolution is:

Resolved, That the Federal Trade Commission is hereby directed to inform the Senate of the United States with all due dispatch why it has not issued and caused to be served upon the offending persons and corporations aforesaid appropriate orders—

And so forth.

Mr. OWEN. Might it not be better to ask them what steps they have taken to accomplish this result?

Mr. REED. I think not, because the matter is not in dispute. It will not be disputed that they have not issued such an order; and if it should be——

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator to what the words "said appropriate orders" refer, on line 5 of page 2? On a cursory glance through the resolution I do not find any orders referred to, but I may have overlooked them.

Mr. REED. That is not the word "said." That is "aforesaid." The word is split in the middle at the end of the line.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Oh, I see; yes.

Mr. REED. It says "corporations aforesaid."

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will ask the Senator whether he has any objection to a reference of this resolution to the committee? The committee will have a meeting to-morrow, and it will be immediately reported to the Senate.

Mr. REED. Oh, yes; I want the resolution passed. I want the information, and I see no reason to refer a resolution simply asking for information.

Mr. NEWLANDS. At the proper time I will make a motion to refer the resolution to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I am not going to object to the adoption of the resolution. The situation concerning news-print paper is most important, and it is one that should be brought sharply to the attention of the Senate and of the Trade Commission, and I sincerely hope that the Department of Justice will take notice of the interest of the Senate in the question.

I feel that the Senator from Missouri has done a public service in bringing the matter to public attention in this way. So far as the Trade Commission is concerned, it can take care of itself in any answer it may make to the resolution. I am not concerned to defend the Federal Trade Commission in any respect, but I am very much concerned in the understanding that the Federal Trade Commission may get of the attitude of the Senate toward its treatment of questions of this kind.

There is a very sharp distinction between the punishment of offenses against the antitrust laws and the regulation of unfair methods of competition under the Federal Trade Commission bill. There is the same distinction that there is between the application of an injunction by a court of equity against something that is not quite a crime and the effort to apply equitable procedure to prevent the commission of crime. There is no doubt that a crime has been committed in this case, in the opinion of the Federal Trade Commission. The facts reported by the Federal Trade Commission show that there has been an offense by the news-print paper manufacturers against the antitrust act, and that offense, being completed and being serious, ought to be promptly prosecuted by the Department of Justice.

My fear is that the Federal Trade Commission will think, from the passage of this resolution, that it is the opinion of the Senate that they should proceed by injunction to prevent the further commission of crime. Now, that is just the distinction between the Sherman Antitrust Act and the Federal Trade Commission act, which was merely intended to be supplementary to the Sherman Antitrust Act and to prevent completing restraints of trade.

I make these observations. They contain my views of the distinction between the two statutes. I am well aware that they do not express the views of some Senators, but I wanted to make them, so that the Federal Trade Commission will know that there are some Senators who believe that since they have uncovered a crime and called it to the attention of the Department of Justice they have nothing further to do with it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Chair to the fact, which he has perhaps overlooked, that a motion has been made to refer the resolution to the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion has not been made. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

PROTECTION OF MIGRATORY BIRDS.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 1553.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the title of the bill be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the title of the bill.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 1553) to give effect to the convention between the United States and Great Britain for the protection of migratory birds concluded at Washington August 16, 1916, and for other purposes.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I merely wish to ask whether the morning business is closed?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. I do not desire to delay this bill. I am wholly in favor of it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arizona.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1553) to give effect to the convention between the United States and Great Britain for the protection of migratory birds concluded at Washington August 16, 1916, and for other purposes, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That this act shall be known by the short title of the "migratory bird treaty act."

SEC. 2. That unless and except as permitted by regulations made as hereinafter provided, it shall be unlawful to hunt, take, capture, kill, attempt to take, capture, or kill, possess, offer for sale, sell, offer to purchase, purchase, deliver for shipment, ship, cause to be shipped, deliver for transportation, transport, cause to be transported, carry or cause to be carried by any means whatever, receive for shipment, transportation or carriage, or export, at any time or in any manner, any migratory bird, included in the terms of the convention between the United States and Great Britain for the protection of migratory birds concluded August 16, 1916, or any part, nest, or egg of any such bird.

SEC. 3. That subject to the provisions and in order to carry out the purposes of the convention, the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized and directed, from time to time, having due regard to the zones of temperature and to the distribution, abundance, economic value, breeding habits, and times and lines of migratory flight of such birds, to determine when, to what extent, if at all, and by what means, it is compatible with the terms of the convention to allow hunting, taking, capture, killing, possession, sale, purchase, shipment, transportation, carriage, or export of any such bird, or any part, nest, or egg thereof, and to adopt suitable regulations permitting and governing the same, in accordance with such determinations, which regulations shall become effective when approved by the President.

SEC. 4. That it shall be unlawful to ship, transport, or carry, by any means whatever, from one State, Territory, or District to or through another State, Territory, or District, or to or through a foreign country, any bird, or any part, nest, or egg thereof, captured, killed, taken, shipped, transported, or carried at any time contrary to the laws of the State, Territory, or District in which it was captured, killed, or taken, or from which it was shipped, transported, or carried. It shall be unlawful to import any bird, or any part, nest, or egg thereof, captured, killed, taken, shipped, transported, or carried contrary to the laws of any Province of the Dominion of Canada in which the same was captured, killed, or taken, or from which it was shipped, transported, or carried.

SEC. 5. That employees of the Department of Agriculture authorized by the Secretary of Agriculture to enforce the provisions of this act shall, with respect thereto, have the same powers as are conferred by law on marshals with respect to executing the laws of the United States. Any such employees shall have authority, without warrant, to search any place other than a dwelling, and, with warrant, to search any dwelling, if he shall have reason to suspect that there is concealed therein any bird, or any part, nest, or egg thereof, which has been captured, killed, taken, shipped, transported, or carried, or which is possessed, contrary to the provisions of this act or of any regulation made pursuant thereto. The several judges of the courts established under the laws of the United States and United States commissioners may, within their respective jurisdictions, upon proper oath or affirmation showing probable cause, issue warrants in all such cases. All birds, or parts, nests, or eggs thereof, captured, killed, taken, shipped, transported, carried, or possessed contrary to the provisions of this act or of any regulations made pursuant thereto shall, when found, be seized by any such employee, or by any marshal or deputy marshal, and, upon conviction of the offender or upon judgment of a court of the United States that the same were captured, killed, taken, shipped, transported, carried, or possessed contrary to the provisions of this act or of any regulation made pursuant thereto, shall be forfeited to the United States and disposed of as directed by the court having jurisdiction.

SEC. 6. That any person, association, partnership, or corporation who shall violate any of the provisions of said convention or of this act, or who shall violate or fail to comply with any regulation made pursuant to this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not more than $500 or be imprisoned not more than six months, or both.

SEC. 7. That nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent the several States and Territories from making or enforcing laws or regulations not inconsistent with the provisions of said convention or of this act, or from making or enforcing laws or regulations which shall give further protection to migratory birds, their nests, and eggs, if such laws or regulations do not extend the open seasons for such birds beyond the dates approved by the President in accordance with section 3 of this act.

SEC. 8. That until the adoption and approval, pursuant to section 3 of this act, of regulations dealing with migratory birds and their nests and eggs, such migratory birds and their nests and eggs as are intended and used exclusively for scientific or propagating purposes may be taken, captured, killed, possessed, sold, purchased, shipped, and transported for such scientific or propagating purposes if and to the extent not in conflict with the laws of the State, Territory, or District in which they are taken, captured, killed, possessed, sold, or purchased, or in or from which they are shipped or transported if the packages containing the dead bodies or the nests or eggs of such birds when shipped and transported shall be marked on the outside thereof so as accurately and clearly to show the name and address of the shipper and the contents of the package.

SEC. 9. That the unexpended balances of any sums appropriated by the agricultural appropriation acts for the fiscal years 1917 and 1918, for enforcing the provisions of the act approved March 4, 1913, relating to the protection of migratory game and insectivorous birds, are hereby reappropriated and made available until expended for the expenses of carrying into effect the provisions of this act and regulations made pursuant thereto, including the payment of such rent, and the employment of such persons and means, as the Secretary of Agriculture may deem necessary, in the city of Washington and elsewhere, cooperation with local authorities in the protection of migratory birds, and necessary investigations connected therewith.

SEC. 10. That if any clause, sentence, paragraph, or part of this act shall, for any reason, be adjudged by any court of competent jurisdiction to be invalid, such judgment shall not affect, impair, or invalidate the remainder thereof, but shall be confined in its operation to the clause, sentence, paragraph, or part thereof directly involved in the controversy in which such judgment shall have been rendered.

SEC. 11. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

SEC. 12. That this act shall become effective immediately upon its passage and approval.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I regret very much that this bill is brought forward at this time. I had understood that the legislation of this session was to be confined to war measures and that nothing was to be done to interfere with the consummation of that kind of legislation. I do not know whether it is claimed that the prevention of the shooting of birds out of season is a war measure or not, but I hardly think it will be claimed that this bill is strictly a preparedness bill. We have a great deal of work to do. We have measures pressing upon us for attention that involve the entire business of the United States. I hope this bill will not be pressed this morning. Undoubtedly it deserves serious consideration, a consideration that it is not going to receive if it is passed this morning.

Let me call attention to just one thing in it. Regardless of whether you shall have game preservation or not, regardless of whether you are in favor of absolutely prohibiting the killing of game anywhere under any circumstances or not, there arises this question, and I challenge the attention of Senators to it.

Mr. BORAH rose.

Mr. REED. If the Senator from Idaho will pardon me, I want to read this and ask his thought in regard to it:

That employees of the Department of Agriculture authorized by the Secretary of Agriculture to enforce the provisions of this act—shall, with respect thereto, have the same powers as are conferred by law on marshals with respect to executing the laws of the United States. Any such employees shall have authority, without warrant, to search any place other than a dwelling, and, with warrant, to search any dwelling, if he shall have reason to suspect that there is concealed therein any bird, or any part, nest, or egg thereof, which has been captured, killed, taken, shipped, transported, or carried, or which is possessed contrary to the provisions of this act or of any regulation made pursuant thereto.

Which, of course, might mean every member of the Agricultural Department force—

Under that any one of the thousands of men employed by the Agricultural Department could be authorized by a mere order of the Secretary to act as marshal, and thereupon without a warrant, without the affidavit of any person, without any of those proceedings that have always attached themselves to search warrants, this gentleman can enter any man's premises except his home on mere suspicion at any time of the day or night. That certainly is entitled to some consideration.

Mr. BORAH. It would be in the hands of the court, I should think.

Mr. REED. I see the Senator from Idaho has risen. I do not know whether he wants to ask me a question or make a comment.

Mr. BORAH. I was looking for the section from which the Senator was reading. From what section was he reading?

Mr. REED. I read from section 5, on page 3.

Mr. President, I undertake to say that even in these times it would be held that that would be an unreasonable search and seizure. I have not read the rest of the bill. I just started to read it and got along that far. What other enormities there may be in it I do not know.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I should like some one who is supporting this measure to explain upon what theory section 5 was constructed. At first glance it seems to me to be a very extraordinary proposition.

Mr. LODGE. As to the powers?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. I think the powers are granted under the game laws of every State.

Mr. BORAH. I read:

> Any such employees shall have authority, without warrant, to search any place other than a dwelling.

Mr. LODGE. The game wardens and their employees have that right.

Mr. GALLINGER. Unquestionably they could in some of the New England States. They have in all States——

Mr. REED. I can not hear the Senator.

Mr. McLEAN. The power is granted in nearly all the States of the Union by State laws.

Mr. BORAH. Has it ever been tested?

Mr. McLEAN. It has never been disputed that I know. I have no particular knowledge of a case tested.

Mr. BORAH. Under the provisions of our Constitution, if I may be permitted to refer to it still, how can a man enter private premises without a warrant and make a search for goods or property? If you can make a law authorizing search and seizure without warrant for this class of articles, you can for any or all other goods or things.

Mr. McLEAN. It is not proposed that he shall enter the house.

Mr. BORAH. I know that; but the Constitution is not confined to the house if it has any application at all.

Mr. McLEAN. It is practically the same provision that you will find in most of the States for the enforcement of game laws. You could not enforce it without some such provision, and the wardens would be appointed as deputy marshals are now appointed by the marshals under the Federal law. There is nothing revolutionary about it.

I will say that I am very much in favor of this proposed law. It was drawn by the solicitor in the Agricultural Department.

Mr. BORAH. So was the food bill, as I understand, which we had before us a day or two ago.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator speak louder? We are unable to hear on this side.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is a private conversation.

Mr. OVERMAN. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Connecticut if this is a war measure?

Mr. McLEAN. It is a food-conservation measure; and I will say to the Senator from North Carolina that if it is not disposed of in any other way I shall offer it as an amendment to the pending bill, because, if there is anything in statistics, I can demonstrate that the operation of this proposed law will tend to conserve the food of the country to quite as liberal an extent as anything that is contained in the pending bill.

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator from Missouri will permit me, so far as the general purpose of it is concerned, I have no doubt it is a good purpose to be served, a good object to be obtained.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator let me interrupt him there? This is something more than a food-conservation bill. It is an act of Congress to carry into effect a treaty which we made with Great Britain, and we are under every obligation to carry that treaty into effect. It should have been done at the last session of Congress, and it would have been done if it had not been for the opposition of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. He opposed the bill then just as strenuously as he opposes it now, although the provision permitting the search of premises without warrant had been eliminated for the purpose of avoiding his opposition.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, I want to say that the failure to carry out treaties we have made is little short of an act of bad faith. I do not think that this is the time of all others when we want to fail to carry out our treaty agreements.

Mr. REED. Permit me to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question. Surely the Senator does not mean to be understood as saying that we will violate our treaty with England if we do not pass a law authorizing a man who is not even a peace officer to invade the premises of a citizen without a warrant? There is no obligation of that kind——

Mr. LODGE. That is a detail of the bill. I think it is sound, and it is the only way to enforce it. It is done in every State. I do not care to discuss that detail. My point is that a failure to legislate is a failure to carry out a treaty we have made.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I may be permitted to say that no doubt we ought to carry out our treaties. I think, however, it is but proper to say that we ought to carry them out in harmony with the fundamental principles of our Government. I am not opposing this proposition so far as its fundamentals are concerned. I have no doubt we have a duty to perform in regard to it. But I want to ask the Senator in all seriousness if living in a State where 80 per cent of the territory was under the domination of the National Government would he care to add the power to the representatives of a particular department in Washington to go there and search their private premises without warrant or without any authority of law whatever except a general act of Congress? It becomes a very serious matter when it relates to the territory of a State about 20 per cent of which only is left for the citizen now. I want at least to hear those who believe or think they have any reason to believe that this particular clause is constitutional.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, there is no question in my mind as to the constitutionality of this law. The section to which our attention has just been called in regard to search and seizure undoubtedly follows the language used in most of the States. If it is desirable to limit the privilege to buildings adjacent to homes or adjacent buildings, it might be considered.

But I wish to call the attention of the Senate to this point. I thought the Senate understood that this bill is here in direct response to a request contained in a resolution passed by the Senate four years ago and it was due to the desire of the Senate that this treaty was negotiated with Great Britain.

I have here a letter which appears in the report of the committee, signed by the Secretary of State, Mr. Lansing, addressed to Mr. Flood, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives. I will take this opportunity to read it into the RECORD. It is very brief.

> DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
> Washington, January 25, 1917.
> Hon. HENRY D. FLOOD,
> Chairman Committee on Foreign Affairs,
> House of Representatives.
>
> SIR: While it is not customary for the Department of State to present to committees of Congress, unsought by the committees, its views on bills pending before the committees and emanating from other departments of the Government, still, in view of the fact that the convention between the United States and Great Britain for the protection of migratory birds, proclaimed by the President on December 8, 1916, was negotiated by the department and that the United States is obligated by the convention to enact the "necessary measures for insuring the execution of the convention," I have the honor to make known to your committee the interest which the Department of State takes in the passage during the present session of Congress of the bill H. R. 20080, now before your committee, to give effect to the convention mentioned.
> I have the honor to be, sir,
> Your obedient servant,
> ROBERT LANSING.

That was at the last session of Congress. This bill was introduced early in this session and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and reported out. I can say that those especially interested in this law in the Dominion of Canada are already wondering whether our request for this treaty was genuine or not, and it is due to the fact of the apparently unnecessary delay in keeping our faith in this matter.

As I have said, the proposed law was drawn with great care. There must be some provision whereby the Department of Agriculture can appoint an agent to apprehend and detect offenders. If I could take the time of the Senate—if I desired to do so—in relating the history of the inability of the Government to enforce the law which is now on the statute books because of the fact——

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator will permit me, what objection can there be of having the issuance of a warrant before search and seizure? It is not difficult at all; my observation leads me to believe that it is a very easy matter for the representatives of the different departments to swear out warrants.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator knows as well as I do the difficulty of authorizing an officer to carry around a bunch of John Doe and Richard Roe warrants in his pockets and giving him the right to search on suspicion provided you protect his dwelling.

Mr. BORAH. There is a vast difference, because when a man makes an oath he is responsible in a certain way, and if he proceeds recklessly and in disregard of facts or without any real reason there is a way to get at it, and it makes him more modest and moderate in his search when there is no reason for a search.

Would the Senator object to using American language here instead of the language of czars and emperors? It says here, "if he shall have reason to suspect." Why not insert, "have reason to believe," at least.

Mr. McLEAN. I have no objection to that amendment whatever. I think, on the whole, it is an improvement.

Mr. BORAH. I move, on page 3, line 17, to strike out the word "suspect" and insert the word "believe."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator in all seriousness if he would not consider the proposition of having the issuance of a warrant in all these instances.

Mr. McLEAN. I do not think it helps the situation from the point of view of the Senator from Idaho. If the law is to be enforced at all, these agents must have some power of search without a warrant. It seems to me that the Senator's objection has little force from his own point of view.

Mr. BORAH. On the other hand, the Senator takes into consideration not at all the convenience or the privacy of the citizen as against bad-faith annoyance, annoyance in bad faith as it takes place in the Western States, as we know by reason of our association and close association with representatives of these departments constantly. It is that class of men who ride roughshod and imperiously over the rights of private citizens simply because they are armed with some color of authority from Congress.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator also knows the history of the law which we have now on the statute books has demonstrated that unless the Government has this power the agents appointed by the Agricultural Department can not enforce the law, because there are in some of the Western States associations formed with plenty of money for the express purpose of violating the law. Their purposes are published in the press; the names of the persons who propose to defy the law are published in the press.

Mr. BORAH. There is no trouble for the man to get a warrant.

Mr. McLEAN. It would not be as to the leaders, but these people employ others to furnish ducks and birds to the market. The identity of those persons could not be ascertained and they could not be apprehended unless the officer can search and seize.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator takes into consideration perhaps 1 per cent of the citizens of the Western States. I doubt very much if there is any real foundation for any of that suspicion.

Mr. McLEAN. I would like to read——

Mr. BORAH. You can read anything these days. I have the good fortune to live in one of the Western States. In any event, it covers perhaps 1 or 2 per cent of the people of those States. The other 98 per cent I am interested in, and I know from observation and from experience the constant annoyance it is to the people to have an intrusion from the personal representatives of the Forestry Department and then from the Agricultural Department, and so forth and so on. I do not want to turn a man loose recklessly to invade the premises of every settler and every farmer and every ranchman whom he may "suspect" to be acting in violation of the law.

Mr. McLEAN. I do not know a case where a person inclined to obey the law has been troubled.

Mr. BORAH. I know many of them.

Mr. McLEAN. I think 99 per cent of the people of the Senator's State would obey the law.

Mr. BORAH. I did not hear the Senator.

Mr. McLEAN. I do not think the Senator need concern himself about his own people, because I understand they are law-abiding citizens. It would not interfere with anyone who would obey the law for the Secretary of Agriculture to appoint an agent under this bill to apprehend those who violate the law.

Mr. BORAH. Well, I have some knowledge as to what these representatives of the department sometimes do.

Mr. McLEAN. Not under this law.

Mr. BORAH. I do not think there is any difference, so far as the representatives of the department are concerned, in the elemental character of the gentleman whom they send out.

Mr. McLEAN. I think it is hardly fair for the Senator from Idaho to attribute all the sins that have been committed in his State under different legislation and under entirely different conditions and circumstances to this bill.

Mr. BORAH. No; it is not that, Mr. President; but I am attributing it to the bureaucratic spirit which dominates those States by reason of the fact that so much of their territory is under their control, and I do not want it enlarged in a reckless way. If the Senator will insert the language "upon the issuance further about this section. I am in favor of the general objects of a warrant," so far as I am concerned, I shall say nothing of the bill, and I realize that we should carry out the treaty; but to simply say to these representatives of the department, "You may go and arrest and interfere with anyone whom you suspect," without any responsibility back of them, is to give them a power to annoy every citizen, it does not make any difference how well and how earnestly he obeys the law.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator from Idaho understand that under section 3 of this bill the Department of Agriculture would have authority to prescribe rules and regulations under which they might punish an individual for hunting within his own State? In other words, is it the understanding of the Senator from Idaho that before a man could hunt or capture or kill or be in the possession of any game within his own State he would have to obtain a license from some authority, to be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture?

Mr. BORAH. I was discussing section 5, I will say to the Senator. I have not very closely observed section 3.

Mr. KING. I understood the Senator from Idaho to be discussing another section of the bill; but, as I understood the Senator, if the objections to the section which he was discussing were obviated by the amendment to which he referred, he would have no objection to the bill.

Mr. BORAH. Perhaps I should have said that my objections would then be removed as to section 5, which I was discussing at the time.

Mr. KING. May I direct my inquiry to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. McLEAN. If I understand the Senator correctly, the provision to which he objects is substantially a copy of the law as it now is. The Secretary of Agriculture, as the Senator probably knows, establishes zones, and for those zones he provides regulations, taking into consideration the seasonal flight of birds. I do not know whether or not the Senator is familiar with the law as it exists to-day.

Mr. KING. Is it the understanding of the Senator from Connecticut that a person upon some of the public domain in the Western States and Western Territories would be unable to do any hunting whatever until he got a permit from the Secretary of Agriculture?

Mr. McLEAN. Oh, no. This does not propose to change the existing law in that respect. I think in some 36 States of the Union to-day the State law conforms to the Federal law. At present if the State law requires you to take out a license you have to take out a license under that law. This statute does not affect that question at all.

Mr. KING. As I read this bill, I obtain the idea that before a person could hunt he had to obtain a license from the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. McLEAN. There is nothing in this bill to that effect.

Mr. KING. Well, but he would have to conform to regulations which would be prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture, and if he violated the law, if he hunted out of season, of course he would have to respond to it just as he would under the State law.

Mr. McLEAN. If he violated the law, if he hunted out of season, of course he would have to respond to it just as he would under the State law.

Mr. KING. But does not the Senator from Connecticut understand that under this bill the Secretary of Agriculture would have the authority to prescribe regulations, to be approved by the President, and that if some person hunted in violation of those regulations which had been prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture he would be subject to fine and to the pains and penalties prescribed by this bill?

Mr. McLEAN. That is quite right.

Mr. KING. So that the Federal Government, then, would in a way prescribe licenses, regulations, and rules under which a person might hunt?

Mr. McLEAN. This proposed law has nothing whatever to do with licenses, I will say to the Senator. This has been the law in the Senator's own State since March 4, 1912.

Mr. KING. I understand that it is the law in my State that in order to hunt one must obtain a license of the State authorities.

Mr. McLEAN. But it has been the Federal law requires no license.

Mr. KING. I understand the contention of the Senator, but the purpose of the Senator is to perpetuate whatever statute may exist and to give to the Federal Government the power to determine who shall hunt within a State and to prescribe pains and penalties if the person shall violate the regulations that are prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. McLEAN. The law would not be of much value if it did not do that.

Mr. KING. Well, it seems to me, Mr. President, that a measure of that kind is a usurpation of the powers of the State.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BORAH. I want to offer an amendment, to see if the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] or the Senator who is in charge of the bill [Mr. SMITH of Arizona] will not accept it. On page 3, line 15, I move to strike out the word "without" and to insert in lieu the word "upon"; after the word "warrant" to insert the words "duly issued"; then, in line 16, to strike out the words "other than" and to insert in lieu thereof the word "including"; and to strike out, in line 16, the words "with warrant, to search any dwelling," so that the section at that point would read:

> Any such employees shall have authority, upon warrant duly issued, to search any place, including a dwelling, and if he shall have reason to believe that there is concealed therein any bird—

And so forth.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed amendment will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to change the phraseology of the bill on page 3, in lines 14, 15, and 16, so that it will read:

> Any such employees shall have authority, upon warrant duly issued, to search any place, including a dwelling, and if he shall have reason to believe that there is concealed therein any bird, or any part, nest, or egg thereof.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH].

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I do not wish to take the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] from the floor, but I desire to suggest to him, being particularly anxious to conserve bird life in so far as I can, that, in my judgment, it is an absolute physical impossibility for a game warden to go back probably 50 or 100 miles to get a warrant when he sees game in the possession of people. They may say, "The game is not mine," although dozens of ducks may be lying dead which have been shot in violation of law.

Mr. BORAH. All such a person would have to do to avoid this law would be to put the slaughtered game in his house. Then the warden would have to go back for a warrant.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If he can get somebody to guard that house until he gets back, he can do that.

Mr. BORAH. He could do just the same with reference to the other proposition.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. How can the game warden possibly get a warrant before the game itself is transported? While the warden has gone to procure a warrant those who have been carrying on this nefarious business may have gone to the four corners of the earth.

Mr. BORAH. I do not understand the logic of the Senator's contention. All they would have to do in order to conceal themselves and the property which was sought to be conserved would be to put it in their houses.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. But the duck hunter is not a man who has his residence where he hunts. Such a one is as much in favor of preserving these birds as we are. This law is aimed at the professional pothunter.

Mr. BORAH. So far as the duck hunter is concerned, it is never difficult to get him.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I do not refer alone to ducks, but to any kind of game.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if I may interrupt, I desire to make this suggestion——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] expected to address the Senate this morning on the pending measure; that is, on the unfinished business.

Mr. BORAH. On this measure?

Mr. REED. No; on the unfinished business. This matter is brought up here in the morning hour with an attempt to put it through without any consideration.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me right here, it seems to be the evident purpose to prolong the discussion until 2 o'clock, so that no vote may be had on this bill to-day. That being the purpose, I think, so far as I am concerned, it will be useless to delay the consideration of the food-control bill until that hour; and, if that is the set purpose of Senators, there is no use of the pending bill occupying further the attention of the Senate at this time.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I am not alluding to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I trust the Senator from Arizona does not intimate that my amendment is offered in bad faith.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Not at all; on the contrary, I have said that I was not alluding to the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] is entitled to the floor. Senators who desire to interrupt a Senator on the floor must address the Chair, and get permission.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I did address the Chair, as loud as the condition of my voice would permit, before I made the suggestion to the Senator from Missouri. I am sorry the Chair did not understand me; but I make no complaint as to that. I simply wanted to suggest to the Senator from Idaho that I had no reference to him in the allusion that I made.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Arizona has very plainly stated that I am trying to filibuster this bill over until 2 o'clock.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. No; I did not use any such words.

Mr. REED. No; but very clearly the Senator expressed the idea that that was the purpose; and he very carefully excepted the Senator from Idaho from the mild impeachment. Now, I want to say to my very good friend from Arizona that when a measure is brought in here which I believe violates the Constitution I intend to insist upon its discussion. In less than five minutes' time, at the last session, I called attention to the provisions in section 5, which were so bad that they were withdrawn from the bill, and now they appear reinserted. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] made the statement on the floor a few moments ago that they had been withdrawn at the last session, saying that they were withdrawn because of my opposition. I have never tried to filibuster a bill to death in my life; I have never been a party to a filibuster; but I have insisted upon my right to protest against legislation which I believe is unwise. I intend to protest against this measure in its present form and to point out the reasons for my opposition; and it seems to me it is in very bad taste for the Senator to intimate that because I am doing that I am endeavoring to stop the public business.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield to me for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I did not insinuate that the Senator's purpose was to filibuster, and I am sorry that the Senator appears to be so supersensitive. It seems to me, from the long years of our association, he might have placed a different interpretation on my language. I knew the Senator was opposing this bill, and my suggestion was that, as the opposition would not cease before 2 o'clock, it was my purpose to withdraw the bill and offer it as an amendment to the bill which is the unfinished business. I had no purpose whatever of accusing the Senator of any filibuster; nothing was further from my purpose.

I thought that the time would be consumed without reaching a conclusion on the bill. I see that it is being consumed, and I repeat that I think the hour of 2 o'clock will arrive before the opposition to the bill shall have subsided. Therefore, in view of the circumstances, there is no necessity for my taking up the time of the Senate longer, but I give notice that this bill will be voted on before the unfinished business of the Senate is finally concluded. So far as I am concerned, I am perfectly willing to withdraw the bill at this time, so that the consideration of the food-control bill may be proceeded with.

Mr. BORAH. As I understand, the Senator from Arizona is willing that the bill shall be withdrawn. I should like a little more time to look over section 5; and if it is desired to take up the food-control bill, that is perfectly agreeable to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, Senate bill 1553 is withdrawn from the consideration of the Senate at this time.

CONSERVATION OF FOOD AND FUEL.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to consideration of House bill 4961.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oregon.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 4961) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel, which had been reported by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, with amendments.

Mr. JOHNSON of California obtained the floor.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HARDWICK. I wanted to make a motion with reference to the pending bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I desire to be heard for a brief period upon the bill, but not for long. I will be very glad to yield so that the motion contemplated by the Senator from Georgia may be made, but will ask the Senator if he expects to discuss the motion at length?

Mr. HARDWICK. I think the motion will involve some discussion. It is a motion to recommit part of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I will ask the Senator to pardon me, then, if I proceed. I will not occupy more than 15 minutes of the time of the Senate in the presentation of what I wish to say upon this particular measure.

Mr. President, in speaking to the measure now I speak to it generally; I speak to its general import, purpose, and design, not to any bizarre amendment that may have been recently attached to the particular measure.

With the obvious design of this bill to prevent speculation in food products and to control food prices there is, apparently, universal sympathy. The objections voiced are not to the purpose or the objects of the legislation but to the methods chosen. I concede that the powers conferred by the pending measure are of such extraordinary character that they must be justified only by dire war necessity, but in the determination of whether or not such autocratic authority should be conferred upon the officials of our Government we are compelled to depend in a great degree upon their judgment. I do not grant such powers as have already been granted by acts passed by the Congress, nor those embraced within this bill, because I like to or because I want to. I do it because those whom the people of this Nation have chosen to administer in time of peace and to command in time of war most earnestly insist that the war can be carried to successful conclusion only by concentration of the autoratic powers demanded. In time of national crisis, there must be lodged in one central agency the right immediately to use and direct every resource of the Nation. We have placed this authority with the President. His is the power and his the responsibility. We, who fondly regard ourselves as the jealous guardians of the rights and the liberties of the people, will be quick to resent and swift to remedy any abuse of the power we give. Personally I have voted and will vote to give the autocratic powers requested without fear of ultimately affecting our democracy. I have an abiding optimism in the democracy of America, and a concentration of powers greater than those of any ruler on earth in a time of peril is a test of the courage and the confidence of democracy in its own strength and virtue. The same optimism which leads me without fear to confer despotic powers upon those who command us to-day, with the fixed determination to recall and redistribute these powers when the crisis shall have passed, led me to oppose with all the vigor of which I was capable the endeavor to muzzle our press and gag our people. A real democracy sure of itself may in safety centralize its power for its own protection and may always tell its people the truth. That democracy which fears to confer upon its chosen instruments the powers necessary for its maintenance and preservation, and which fears the truth to its own people, has within it the seeds of dissolution. I am very glad, therefore, at the request and the demand of those whom the American people have chosen as their leaders, to give to them, with the sword and purse of the Nation, authority over the means of subsistence itself.

That the necessity exists for some legislation to prevent hoarding and speculation and robbery of our people in food products seems to be conceded by all. There is but one character of legislation now presented, and I feel, therefore, that this we must accept and with it, at least, make the trial.

Modern warfare consists not alone of battles of armies, but of tests of endurance and service and sacrifice by the contending peoples. Modern warfare, now of such gigantic scale that but a few years ago the most vivid imagination could not picture it, requires service and sacrifice not only upon the battle field but in every human activity. I have heard the slogan of late in relation to our commercial world that business should be as usual. There can be no "business as usual" during the war. There must be sacrifice of profits just as there is sacrifice of blood. There must be the conscription of property and of wealth just as we have conscription of our youth. While, of course, legitimate enterprise during the conflict should be nurtured and encouraged, it must understand from the very beginning of this war that no profitable patriotism will be tolerated. If a concrete illustration were required to demonstrate the necessity for some sort of legislation in relation to prices it is found in the recent discussion concerning the Steel Corporation. We find before the war this corporation selling its product for from $21 to $25 a ton. At the beginning of 1916 its contracts for the delivery of steel plates to commercial shipbuilding concerns was $42.56 per ton, and that very recently it asked from the United States Government $95 per ton. When an ordinary man sees his loved boy snatched from his home to be shot to pieces upon a foreign soil and reads of profits asked by a corporation created by his Government of six hundred millions per year during the war he can not be blamed for the demand in which our people unite and in which the Congress unites by the passage of just such bills as this, that we conscript the hours and the dollars of those who stay at home and the profits of those grown rich already from a too indulgent Nation, just as we have already conscripted the lives of our youth.

One of the objections most often heard to bills of the sort under discussion is that we intrust unbounded authority to unnamed and unknown individuals. Fortunately that objection does not obtain in this instance. Peculiarly fitted for the task of food administrator is Herbert C. Hoover. He is not alone a most distinguished American. He is a distinguished world figure. He has already demonstrated transcendent ability as an administrator, and he has been striving for humanity with an altruism that challenges the admiration and affection of us all. No happier selection and none more competent could have been made. And I feel that the American people can confidently intrust the difficult and almost impossible task concerning our foods to this man. I happen to know intimately many of the men with whom he has surrounded himself, men of proven ability and character, men of wisdom and wide vision, and I feel that if this tremendous task can be at all performed it will be performed by Hoover and his associates.

The military problem of the Nation for the moment has been disposed of. There will be no lack of men under our drastic conscription law. The victory, however, will ultimately be decided by the organization behind the lines, by the men and the machinery and the methods out of sight and out of hearing of the battle. It will be more than a year before our military forces will be a potential factor upon the battle front, and even after that time they can not be a deciding factor without a perfected organization at home. This organization can be had at the price only of personal sacrifice on the part of every adult, and the speed with which we achieve this organization at home behind the lines will probably be the measure of American casualty lists. We may organize industrially and economically within a year and make possible thus an allied victory before a single conscripted soldier has set foot in France. The possible result is worth the effort. America must make the sacrifice in dollars and creature comforts within the next year or she must make thereafter the sacrifice in men and then, ultimately, the sacrifice in material things as well. The short cut to victory is organization, and this organization can come only with a concentration of authority. It is, therefore, with an absolute confidence and optimism in democracy and in democracy's strength to vest its powers in centralized authority for its maintenance and protection; it is because with the industrial and commercial organizations and sacrifice we may sooner win that victory that must be ours in this war; and it is with the hope that with the patriotic use of our overwhelming resources we may be saved some of the sacrifice of American blood that I give my vote to a bill according the most extraordinary and autocratic powers ever before conferred in our Nation.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, among the many results of war, always terrible, there is one often overlooked and that is the excitement which it causes in the popular mind, in the minds of people generally, whose one anxiety is to win the war and bring it to a conclusion. We see it in the demands that come to us by telegraph, by letter, and through the newspapers, to pass this bill in a moment.

I saw the other day in a leading newspaper of New York the statement that any one who discussed this bill, or expressed opposition to any part of it, was in the pay of the Food Trust; and I have seen cartoons representing that the one great thing was the food speculator who was holding up the food of the country. Evidently they did not know that the Congress had already passed a bill with the most drastic provisions, in the amendment put on by the Senator from Washington, in regard to the food speculator. There is but one opinion about those men. We have already, in both Houses, made provision to deal with them; and the very people who telegraph and write with so much excitement have no idea what is in this bill. They think, in a general way, that it relates to the regulation and distribution of food products; I think they may know that there is a minimum-price provision in it; but beyond that—and I do not question their honesty or their patriotism in the least—they do not know what some of the other provisions are.

Now, we have to meet and we have to legislate in the midst of war conditions, one of which is an excited public mind. We also have to meet a mental condition which exists among people who already have and who are seeking more huge powers. Power, Mr. President, is a very dangerous thing. More than one of the Roman emperors, the Cæsars, went mad by the simple possession of unrestrained and universal power, and we have that pressure continually at our doors to give constantly more power.

To take an example, it has been confidently asserted and generally undenied, certainly, that there was a determination or a desire in certain quarters not only to make all our industries sell to the Government at low prices, but to make them sell to foreign governments at low prices. I shall come in a moment to the effect of that. I merely use it now as an illustration.

Mr. President, I do not think they stop to consider exactly what that means. Our imports from Great Britain in 1912 were $272,000,000; in 1913, $295,000,000; in 1914, $293,000,000; in 1915, $256,000,000; and in 1916, $308,000,000. Our importations from Great Britain have increased over the period of peace. Have the British Government compelled their manufacturers and producers to sell to us at low prices? They have contemplated nothing of the sort, and they would be very unwise, in my judgment, if they did.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. I merely wish to ask the Senator if that increase is an increase in quantity or in value, or both?

Mr. LODGE. I have only the value, but I believe it is both.

Mr. THOMAS. I am told that it is an increase in value but a decrease in quantity.

Mr. LODGE. I think not. I think it is an increase in quantity as well as in value.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I want also to add to what the Senator has stated, that the exportations of England to all parts of the world have increased during the war period, not only to this country but to all the other countries of the world; and I have failed yet to see in the papers a notice or even a claim to the effect that the goods that were being sold by England to the balance of the world have been sold for any less than the highest price they could obtain for them.

Mr. LODGE. I am very glad for one, Mr. President, that English trade and English exports have increased. It will help her and help us to win the war to have her commerce and her industries profitable and her exports large. But I call attention to the fact that she has not attempted to lower the price of those things that her people are selling, and she ought not to do it, and we ought not to do it; but it has been gravely proposed. I hope it will not be adopted.

I was told the other day—I do not know how truly, but I believe I was correctly informed—that in order to force down the price of sugar we were to compel Cuba to sell it at a lower price, and we were to compel her by withholding foodstuffs from the island. Cuba is our ally. Cuba followed us into the war. Cuba is under our protection; and yet it has been proposed here—it certainly has been a subject of conversation—that we should take our little ally by the throat and make her sell her sugar at cost, or at a low price, to the rest of the world!

Mr. President, without going into treaties—for I suppose treaties have become as antiquated as constitutions—is it wise policy to enter on such schemes as these? I do not say we shall enter on them, but I point out what is proposed, what I hear, as an indication of the mental excitement produced by the possession of great powers, by the war, and by the desire to effect great results.

Mr. President, I think it very important that the Senate of the United States at least should retain its calmness in dealing with these questions. If we exist for anything as a body, if we have existed for any purpose throughout our history, it has been that we could be trusted to give careful consideration to everything of great importance which came before us, and that here the people could find a body perhaps less disturbed than elsewhere by the heady currents of the popular excitement of the moment. Never were calmness and consideration more requisite than now.

There is one other thing which I say with all submission to the newspapers and to the good people who telegraph us and write to us: We not only have the advantage of knowing what laws we are passing and what are presented to us for passage, but we also have responsibility, and they have none. If the measures they demand happen to go wrong, the blame is on us, and not on them; and, having the responsibility, it behooves us to move carefully.

On the 18th of June the President of the United States wrote the following letter to Mr. BORLAND, of the House of Representatives. He says how important the food-administration measure is, and then he continues:

> A certain disservice has been done the measure by speaking of it as the food-control bill. The object of the measure is not to control the food of the country but to release it from the control of speculators and other persons who would seek to make inordinate profits out of it and to protect the people against the extortions which would result.

Mr. President, if the regulation of the food products and their distribution, all of which ought to be in the hands of the Government, were all that is in this bill, it would pass in five minutes.

In what I am about to say in regard to this bill, I wish to confess at the beginning that I speak very much from the standpoint of one who, for the past six weeks, has been engaged every day and all day in trying to prepare a great bill to provide the money for the war.

I ask the Senate to look at what we are doing. First, for the ships we have authorized $750,000,000 and appropriated $500,000,000. No better expenditure of money could be made. The question of ships and of adding to the world's tonnage is a vital and central point in this content.

The next question is food. It is true this bill is not an appropriation bill. It only carries a trifle—$150,000,000, that is all—to enforce these laws, but still $150,000,000 has to be found somewhere.

Transportation we have already dealt with. I may say in passing that I do not think there has ever been a legislative body in history that has done in so short a time so much and such important work as has been done by this Congress. It has been done with the utmost rapidity. The rapidity has attracted the attention and the praise of all the foreign missions which have come to this country. Congress has been accused of slackness only by its own people and its own newspapers. It is in reality an unequaled record of legislation.

We shall need six hundred million dollars for aeroplanes. Nothing could be more necessary; it is absolutely vital. They may be the one instrument of all the instruments with which we shall win this war. That we shall later be called upon to give. Last come the Army and the Navy. I mention them last because at present we appear to be winning the war chiefly by domestic arrangements; but the Army and the Navy are the weapons with which this war will ultimately be won, because we must rely on the Navy for the conduct of our ships and the transporting of our troops as well as the protection of our coasts, and we must rely on the Army for the fighting that is done on the front in Europe.

We have appropriated $3,000,000,000 and over to the Army and Navy. All these things require an immense amount of money. A part of it we shall borrow, a part of it we shall raise by taxation. The question of the proportion between the amount to be raised by taxation and the amount to be taken from loans will be a question which will come up in connection with the revenue bill, but a large amount of the money is to be raised by taxation. I think the taxes now imposed on this country will yield above $1,200,000,000. With the new bill the amount will probably go to $3,000,000,000, to be raised by taxation, this year.

I have been engaged in the very unpleasant task with the other members of the Finance Committee of imposing taxes upon this country, by which we shall get that vast sum of money; and let me say now, in passing, that there has been no outcry as to delay about the tax bill. Nobody is hurry-ing Congress to impose taxes. People are all ready to spend enormous sums, to grant money with both hands; they are all ready to legislate at enormous expense in other directions, but they are in no haste to have the taxes imposed. We have been able to take our time in considering that bill without being subjected to criticism as slackers.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to lay down this general proposition, that the money you raise by your loans and your taxes is absolutely vital. Without money you can not have your armies and navies, you can not have your aeroplanes, you can not have your food control, you can not have your ships, you can not have anything that is necessary for this war. The money is at the back of it all.

Now, what do we want to do in order to get the money? The first thing that is important is that our industries should be kept at the highest point of productivity. If nobody is making any money, you will not have any excess profits. If nobody is making any money, your income tax will dwindle away, and those are the two great sources of taxation. They will supply at least two-thirds of what we raise. But in order to get the excess profits the profits must be made; in order to get the incomes the incomes must be earned or received, and out of the surplus on incomes and out of that on excess profits you have not only to pay the taxes but you have to fill your loans. There is where you must get your money. If you paralyze business, if you frighten it, if you repress the productive energies of the country you are drying up the sources of taxation absolutely.

Mr. President, as I said, having been considering this financial question, I proceed from that point of view naturally first to consider some of the things which are proposed. I see no evidence, let me say, on the part of wealth or business to resist in any way full payment or doing the utmost to supply the money the Government needs. But they can not supply it unless they have it. Confiscating all great estates in the country would not last over a year. You must have business going on; you must have it producing from year to year; you must have it make the profits. Take what you want of the profits, take what you want of the incomes, leave enough to supply the loans, leave enough to carry on the business and extend it, but do not kill them at their sources. Do not create a condition in which business will not go on.

Mr. President, I do not care to examine this bill in detail. I expect to support it. I expect to support every measure which will help us to win this war. But I think we ought first to consider it pretty carefully. It has come to us from our committee improved over what it was as it left the House, but it is still, to my mind, a most amazing measure. There is section 4. I do not propose to go into it—I have not considered it deeply enough—but it seems to me as if we were going some distance beyond that once venerated instrument, the Constitution of the United States, in creating crimes. Look at section 5. I am not sure that I thoroughly understand it, but I have read it with some care. It seems to me that this section confers the power upon the President—and when we say the President we mean the agents whom he appoints to carry out the law, for he can not carry it out. He has more things to do now than any human being can do. He can not possibly do all these things himself. He has to have agents. We are conferring on these agents, as I apprehend this section, the power to put out of business, absolutely to stop the business, of a corporation, partnership, or individual in this country. If somebody in power dislikes or is dissatisfied with some business corporation or partnership there is ample power in the bill to put it out of existence. That may be necessary, but let us consider it pretty carefully before we grant it. It seems to me possible to get all powers which are necessary for the winning of the war without absolutely putting it in the hands of a group of men to ruin any business which they can in some remote way connect with the war, any business engaged in interstate or foreign commerce as we have modified it. Under that section it seems to me that we give the power to fix prices, the maximum. The minimum is given elsewhere. The President's representatives can certainly fix the price of the products of corporations or business houses or business men coming within the description of the section.

Mr. President, I have a very grave doubt about the wisdom of undertaking to fix prices, maximum or minimum. Fixing prices is almost as old as the history of organized society. It has been attempted over and over again, and it has always and invariably failed. It is economically unsound. It has been tried recently in France and Germany. I hold in my hand a little book called "The First Consequences of the War," by Dr. Gustave le Bon, who is one of the great scientific men and great sociologists and one of the most distinguished writers and publicists of France. He refers to the action of the French Chamber, and he says "in spite of demonstration present and past the Government did seek to intervene in the price of the crops and ended by voting the maximum. The result of this measure was that the State was obliged to become an improvised merchant. It was understood that the moment the Government bought all disposable wheat in order to sell it again at a loss in order to prevent the rise in price of the crop and to extend such a proceeding to other articles of subsistence, they condemned the State to become the sole trader." Then he quotes what was said by some of the newspapers there to the effect "that one of the results of the taxation and the requisition was the absolute arrest of free commerce, which had been placed in the impossibility of continuing the provisioning of the country by the aid of purchases abroad." He quotes sugar as an example:

> The scarcity of sugar has been a new example of the influence of taxation and intervention of the State. The Temps says that sugar is scarce because the administration displacing commerce has not made the necessary importations in season. They ought to have allowed commerce to be freely exercised. The actual crisis would have been avoided if by threats of requisition at 75 francs last November when American granulated was worth from 80 to 85 francs it had not put commerce in a position where it was impossible to importing it.

He then goes on to show by quotation from German authorities that the maximum and minimum had been a total failure there. I think the maximum is included in this section 5. The minimum is placed in the bill eo nomine. It is there specifically.

Of course what I am now about to say would, in these times, I suppose, be considered very senseless reasons of opposition, but the minimum will open a drain on the Public Treasury which future generations will feel with great severity, and which we shall feel now. What proof is there to be that a man raised a crop and could not get the minimum price? What proof is there that he ever raised it at all? What proof is there that he made an effort to sell it at a price above the minimum? Endless demands on the Treasury are opened up. It is a plan apparently to get the producers of food crops to feed themselves and feed the allies. No one can question the excellence of the purpose. But, Mr. President, if we are to assure to the raisers of food a minimum price, why should we deny it to the builders of ships? You fix a minimum for the farm, and you oblige the operative in the factory to buy at or above that minimum, but you do not fix any minimum for him.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that it is perilous legislation, and I can not see that it is necessary to secure what we seek to achieve. We wish to protect the distribution of crops and see that they are properly distributed. We want to see to it that the allies do not come into the market as they did last May in Chicago and bid against each other until they have raised wheat to a perfectly abnormal price. We must have one agent to buy for the powers allied with us against Germany. We wish to be able to direct supplies to neutral countries. We must be able to regulate the export of coal to Italy. Coal in the case of Italy is the absolutely crucial point in her success in war. We have abundance of coal, and we come back now again to the question of getting it to her. The question of tonnage is one of the questions to which we must give our attention. I desire the fullest powers given in order to have that done. Food speculators are dealt with by the legislation we have already passed. But is it necessary, in order to accomplish these purposes, that every man in this country, every partnership, and every corporation, whether their business is connected with the supplies of the allies or our own supplies or not, should be at the mercy of anybody and refused license if somebody does not happen to like them?

It seems to me, Mr. President, we can achieve the end which we all seek without these immense extensions. The fact is that in this section you are holding over the heads of the business of the country not as to the food crops alone, but as to all the business of the country, a threat and uncertainty. There is nothing so deadly to business as uncertainty and a threat. You hold these over their heads, and then you expect them to be in the highest state of productivity so that you can take millions of dollars from them in excess-profit taxes. They will not have the profits to take from if you frighten business to that extent. Do not lose sight of the fact that the whole key of our situation lies in having the greatest amount of annual earnings which we can properly get in order to supply our taxes and our loans. If you frighten business enough you will not have any excess profits or any incomes to draw upon. You will not have any surplus to buy your loans.

It is not well to consider these questions from only one point of view, and I wished to suggest to the Senate in regard to the minimum provision that they must bear in mind when they pass this bill the importance of doing nothing to interfere with the sources of taxation. Dry up the sources of taxation and you paralyze every effort you are making to carry on the war to a success.

Now, Mr. President, I come to a question which has been thrust upon this bill——

Mr. REED. Before the Senator comes to a new point——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. REED. I should like to get the Senator's view on this proposition. If there is a minimum price fixed on farm products and if the Government then takes over the foreign market—the export business on all our surplus farm products—taking it over by arranging for the purchase through one agent of all supplies that go to our allies and controlling the rest of the world through the embargo act, and if there is in addition to that placed in the power of the Government the authority to go into the market and buy and sell—if these powers are exercised, is there any doubt in the Senator's mind but that it means the fixing of substantially one price to the farmer, both a maximum and a minimum, the minimum being a guaranty of what he will get, and the possibility of getting any more being taken away from the fact that the free and open market has been taken away for his surplus and the market further controlled by the purchasing power of our Government?

Mr. LODGE. If we are to be guided by the working of economic laws, I should say there was not the slightest doubt of the soundness of the Senator's proposition, but we are apparently disregarding economic laws as much as we are in some respects disregarding the Constitution. I am not prepared to say how far the economic laws of the world hitherto in existence can be overridden. Personally, I do not believe that they can be overridden at all, and I think there will be produced precisely the situation the Senator has described.

Mr. REED. Let me present the question from another angle. I thank the Senator for his courtesy, and I shall take but a moment. Assuming that the price of farm products was raised by the minimum guaranty, will that price not necessarily be carried on to the consumer?

Mr. LODGE. I should say that of course it would.

Mr. REED. And assuming now that the Government shall exercise its right of levying a tax to prevent importations of farm products, does not the Senator think that the operation of those two things is very likely to make the consumer pay a high price, so that instead of giving him relief, as he is now expecting, he may get higher prices as the result?

Mr. LODGE. I think so. I call the Senator's attention to the fact, however, in regard to that "profitable patriotism," of which the Senator from California spoke, these farmers are expressly exempted by section 5. Owing to a thoughtful amendment placed in the bill by the Committee on Agriculture, they are not to be required to have any license; they are not to be interfered with if they hoard or if their prices are thought to be unreasonable; they are to be permitted to be "profitably patriotic." I think the operation of the sending abroad of wheat as described by the Senator from Missouri would inevitably fix their price; that is, it would make a minimum and a maximum. But under section 5 every effort has been made to exempt that important and very numerous class from any restrictions.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. REED. I wish the Senator from Georgia would let me ask one question, because this is a matter which I have raised.

Mr. HARDWICK. Very well.

Mr. REED. If, therefore, the farmer is exempt in the manner which the Senator has suggested, so that he could hoard, and if he should do that, will not the effect be very disastrous on the consumer?

Mr. LODGE. The consumer will suffer under every situation which I see raised by this bill.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. HARDWICK. I desire to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if he really thinks it right that the farmer should be exempted from all these burdens which patriotism imposes on everybody else in the country? Is that even-handed justice? Is that "equal rights to all men and special privileges to none"?

Mr. LODGE. I do not think so. I do not think we ought to have privileged classes; but, Mr. President——

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. GORE. Before the Senator from Massachusetts proceeds to a new phase of the discussion, I wish to say he has alluded to economic laws and to the Constitution of the United States; I am not certain that the Senator was in order when he made those allusions. I wish to say that not long since I received a letter from a friend requesting me to send him a relic of some sort or other, and I sent him a copy of the Constitution of the United States. [Laughter.] What I wish to do, however, is to give a few instances that illustrate and reinforce the point which the Senator is making with respect to economic laws.

The food minister of Great Britain issued an order fixing the price of dairy products. The dairymen were not satisfied with the price; they butchered their milch cows. There was a distinct national, social, and economic loss that could not be repaired within two or three years. Great Britain issued an order instituting a three-course dinner. They kept account of the results, and it was found that the increased consumption of meat and bread under the three-course dinner order more than offset the economy. The people cut out the side dishes and limited themselves to the more substantial foods. That order was revoked. Great Britain instituted one meatless day a week. They kept account of the results, and it was found that the increased consumption of bread on the meatless day more than offset the diminished consumption of meat. They revoked that order. Those orders were issued with the best possible intention, and, it must be admitted, with as much wisdom as man can concentrate upon the most-serious concerns of either private or national life.

Germany fixed a price of 8 cents a quart on milk. The dairymen found that they could feed the milk to their pigs and receive a higher price for milk in the form of pork than by selling the milk outright. Germany fixed a price on wheat, rye, barley, and oats, based on their relative value for human food. It so happens that the relative value of those four cereals for human food does not correspond with their relative value as stock feed. The result was that the farmers fed their wheat and their rye to the live stock, and sold the oats and the barley. Those efforts were made by the Government which has attained the highest degree of efficiency of any Government in all the tides of time.

The Swiss Government determined what would be a reasonable price for meats sold in the butcher shops. They called the butchers together to ascertain what would be their view of the price proposed to be fixed. The butchers, in a patriotic spirit, answered, "Of course, if the Government fixes those prices on meats, we will sell at the prices fixed by the Government—if we sell," but they declared that they would not undertake to carry on their business at those prices.

I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will pardon this interruption, but it demonstrates the futility of any effort to repeal economic laws. In my own judgment, we might as well say, "Be it enacted that the law of gravitation is hereby repealed," as to undertake to enact a law repealing the law of supply and demand or any other fundamental law of economics. I mention these instances, all of which were born of the greatest possible human wisdom; and I merely suggest, as a moral, that we ought to profit by experience. We have no other lamp so infallible as that.

We ought not to set at naught the whole experience of the whole human race.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am very much obliged to the Senator from Oklahoma for what he has said. In speaking of economic laws, in replying to the Senator from Missouri, I spoke a little ironically. Economic laws can not be set aside, although the Constitution of the United States can be set aside by Congress. Economic laws will go on relentlessly, and, to my mind, there is great unwisdom in trying to disregard them.

However, before I pass to the subject of which I wish especially to speak, I desire to say a word of a quite neglected person, inasmuch as something has been said about the consumer. We have heard a great deal about the consumer in past years, and, unless my memory fails me, the tyranny of certain tariffs on consumers has been called to the attention of the country more than once; but the consumer has disappeared in this legislation. The farmer is relieved from the operation of the license, and when you come to the minimum you find that the President is given power—I think rather a novel power—to impose additional tariff duties on any article brought into this country which comes in competition with the minimum. I do not know what becomes of the consumer there; but, being a Yankee, I think I can make a fairly good guess. I merely call attention to that as an unusual, and perhaps overlooked, feature of this bill.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Before the Senator from Massachusetts passes from the so-called favoritism to the farmer—he has mentioned that the farmer was a very numerous class—I should like, if the Senator will allow me, to put this statement into the RECORD: There is not a man on this floor who is a farmer, or who is familiar with farming, but knows that it is notoriously true that the farmer never fixes the price on anything he produces and that he never fixes the price on anything that he buys. So the consumer, for whom the Senator is now making some plea, if he is to be taken care of at all, must be taken care of by our taking care of that class of men in our economic life who set the price of what the farmer produces when they purchase from the farmer, and who then set the price to the consumer when they sell to the consumer. It was, therefore, wise on the part of the committee to exempt the farmer from the operation of these laws, because they would have been noneffective had you included him. The farmer has no voice in the markets of the world, and the Senator from Massachusetts knows that as well as does the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I think that is very probably true. I was speaking of the apparent intent of the bill, and I think the intent of those who drafted it. That intent is to offer a reward to every farmer to grow foodstuffs, if he does not already do so, or to increase the amount which he now grows. I did not go into the detail of it. My own belief is that the farmer would never see one cent of that minimum. The claim that he might have would reach the Treasury, but the money would go to the man who had bought his claim from him. He would not get any of it, and there is, moreover, no minimum put on the price of what the farmer buys.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. No. There is an attempt in the bill to try to bring under the operation of the law those things which are necessary in the production of the farmer's crop. We included steel and its products, we also included fertilizers, and we also included some other things that we thought perhaps, if we are going to attempt to control the price of the farmer's products, we had better also make some provision as to those things which enter into the production of the farmer's crops.

Mr. LODGE. I am sure the Senator from South Carolina did not overlook the farmer's interest.

I now come, Mr. President, to a question which has been imported into this bill, not by the administration or by those who have framed the bill, but which has been placed upon it by Congress itself—that is, the subject of prohibition. In order to define the attitude I take in regard to it I am going to read the words of a very great man in relation to a very much greater reform than that proposed by prohibition. On the 22d of August, 1862, Abraham Lincoln wrote to Horace Greeley a letter, which, I take it, Senators are familiar with, but I think it will bear rereading. It is as follows:

> I would save the Union. I would save it in the shortest way under the Constitution.

Mr. GORE. "Under the Constitution."

Mr. LODGE. Yes; he used that phrase, but that was a long time ago—

> The sooner the national authority can be restored, the nearer the Union will be "the Union as it was." If there be those who would not save the Union unless they could at the same time save slavery, I do not agree with them. If there be those who would not save the Union unless they could at the same time destroy slavery, I do not agree with them. My paramount object in this struggle is to save the Union, and is not either to save or to destroy slavery. If I could save the Union without freeing any slave I would do it; and if I could save it by freeing all the slaves I would do it; and if I could save it by freeing some and leaving others alone I would also do that. What I do about slavery and the colored race, I do because I believe it helps to save the Union; and what I forbear, I forbear because I do not believe it would help to save the Union. I shall do less whenever I shall believe that what I am doing hurts the cause, and I shall do more whenever I believe doing more will help the cause. I shall try to correct errors when shown to be errors, and I shall adopt new views so fast as they shall appear to be true views.
> I have here stated my purpose according to my view of official duty; and I intend no modification of my oft-expressed personal wish that all men everywhere could be free.

Mr. President, the one dominant desire in my heart, the one dominant wish that I have, overmastering everything else, is to win this war. I am ready to subject everything to that—all my personal prejudices, anything I have of party feeling. I want to win this war. That is the only road to peace. We shall and we must win the war. Whatever will help to win the war, I will vote for. Whatever I think will retard us in winning the war, that I will vote against. No matter what the clamor is, no matter what the excitement is, I am here charged with the great responsibility of a Senator of the United States, one of 96 in this body. This is too grave a time to look over the shoulder at anything. The duty is on us. We are not going to save our souls by trying to make other people virtuous by statute; we are going to save our souls, if they can be saved, by what we do ourselves, each one of us.

> It's a dangerous thing to play with souls,
> And trouble enough to save one's own.

We can not put our responsibility off on anybody else.

My belief, as I have said, is that our one great duty is to win this war. If complete prohibition of every form of alcoholic beverages, in my opinion, would aid us most to win this war, I would vote for it. If I thought no prohibition at all would help us win this war, I would vote for that. If I believed that prohibition of certain things and retention of others could help us most toward winning this war, I would vote for that. I would cast any one of those votes without any regard whatever to my personal prejudices, views, or hopes.

Now, Mr. President, the effort to impose general prohibition on the country has been mixed up with the question of the conservation of food, which is most important toward winning the war. In my opinion, we are called upon to decide this question with reference to war, not with reference to its general merits or demerits as a system of social organization. So far as I am personally concerned, if it were feasible and possible, and I were a despot and could do it by a single stroke, I would wipe alcohol for drinking off the face of the earth. I am no lover of it in any way, and no defender of it; but it is here; it has been on this earth ever since there was a human race on it, practically; and the question is, How are we to deal with it now—no matter whether we are prohibitionists or antiprohibitionists or license men or local-option men, how are we to deal with it now in the presence of war so as to make the result most beneficial to the country?

My own belief is that it is clear that we ought to stop absolutely the manufacture of distilled spirits in order to conserve all the grain material which goes into them. The conservation which will be effected in that way is not nearly so large as I wish it were, and it is far from being as large as the people who are crying out so loudly represent it to be; but it is worth saving. So, it is a good thing, in my opinion, to put a stop to the making of distilled liquors at this time. I would carry it further; I would not have any distilled liquors made from fruits. I would stop the manufacture of distilled liquors while the war is on. So far as the temperance effect goes, the great source of mischief is in distilled spirits because of the large proportion of alcohol which they carry.

Now, I come to beer. Beer carries very little alcohol—about 4 per cent. If we abolished all the breweries, several things would follow besides preventing people from drinking beer. In the first place, we should lose in revenue for the ensuing year about one hundred and thirty million or one hundred and forty million dollars. I know that is regarded as a sordid thing to suggest, but I wish gentlemen who think it is sordid and not to be considered would sit down in the committee and try to raise from some new source one hundred and thirty million to one hundred and forty million dollars more revenue than we are raising now. They might think the effort just as sordid, but they would not think such a sum was a trifle to throw away. We would lose that amount of revenue. Then we would lose all the taxes which we now receive on the profits and income of the breweries themselves. About a billion dollars are now invested in breweries. According to the census of 1914, the amount was $792,000,000, and it now probably aggregates a billion dollars. We would lose all the revenue from the earnings of those breweries. How much that would be I can not undertake to say, but it would be a large amount—several million dollars.

There were employed directly in the breweries, in 1914, 62,000 people and the malt producers aggregated 2,000 more. Since that time the number has increased. There are those who are engaged in making machinery, and so forth, for the breweries; and it is estimated by the experts that something over 100,000 people would be thrown upon the streets if the breweries were closed. It may be said, "Why, labor is scarce in this country; they would have no difficulty in procuring other employment"; but I have observed that it is a weakness of human nature that when a man has a good-paying employment he does not like to be suddenly projected on the street, and have it said to him, "Oh, there is plenty of opportunity for labor; you can get other employment."

Mr. President, I have now come to that which, to my mind, is the controlling factor. There is one element involved in winning this war which is more important really than any other, and that is a united public opinion in the United States. Sentiment, imagination, the hopes, the beliefs of the people constitute the great motive force. They are what make people ready to give up their last dollar and to see those who are dearer to them than life itself go to the front—sentiment, love of country, all the greatest emotions that can move the heart of man, which we sum up in the words "public opinion."

Mr. President, it is proposed to abolish all the breweries at a stroke. There may be people who think that the men who are employed in the breweries and engaged in making machinery for them are a class which deserves no mercy. I can not regard in that way any of my fellow citizens engaged in what is an honest employment. I think they deserve consideration. It will cause great dissatisfaction among those people; but there are hundreds of thousands of people in this country to-day, particularly among the working classes and among the labor unions—whom I am beginning to hear from very strongly—who drink a glass of beer, and think it is, as it is, an innocent drink. Suddenly we enter the field and stop all that. Some we drive back to drinking whisky, and probably very bad whisky, made in illicit stills; others we shall anger and annoy. They build our ships, they weave our clothes, they make our shoes and our munitions. They will help largely to fill our armies. Is it wise to anger and chill them needlessly? They will say, "You abolish the poor man's harmless drink and leave to the rich their imported liquors and stored-up wines." It is not well to kindle such resentments in time of war.

We have a great German-American population in this country. I believe the great mass of them to be thoroughly loyal, and loyal at an expense of personal feelings which the descendants of other nations do not have to encounter. We know that light beer is their national drink. They all drink it; they think it absolutely innocent and harmless. It is proposed now to cut them off from the use of that beverage. They will think the law to be especially aimed at them.

I had it in mind to say something about the vineyards. We only get $10,000,000 revenue from wines. They carry from four to five times as much alcohol as beer, but I observe that as the bill has been drawn the President can exempt them. I do not quite understand the consistency of that arrangement from an entirely moral point of view; but it has been done, the vineyards are to be spared. Those vineyards stretch from New York to California and are of immense value. In wine making alone there are employed about 3,000 people, but that does not begin to cover the number of people who are employed in the agricultural part of the industry. It is a great and valuable property, and I think, for the reasons suggested in the case of beer, it ought to be exempted.

But passing from that, I come back to the psychological point. I do not want at this time to offend and anger great masses of our population who see no harm in drinking a glass of beer. It is all well enough to say that they ought to be made good against their will and that they are wrong and wicked to think as they do. There should be some toleration; there should be some liberality of view. I have seen many men who drink beer who are quite as sober as some of those who are crying so loudly for universal prohibition.

Now, Mr. President, this seems to me the great objection to abolishing the breweries and closing them all; but there are other objections. I want to say, before I pass from the subject, that the amount of food saving which will be effected by the prohibition of fermented liquor is practically negligible. Thirteen million bushels of corn, 52,000,000 bushels of malt in the form of barley, and 2,000,000 bushels of rice, in all 67,000,000 bushels, go into the manufacture of beer, rather less than 1 per cent of the total crops drawn upon. The amount of corn, 13,000,000 bushels, is trifling in a corn crop that may run up to 3,000,000,000 bushels. Barley is not consumed by our people to a great extent, at least in the form of bread, and that which has been exported hitherto has gone into making beer in England, if I am correctly informed. The rice used is a trivial amount.

Mr. President, a large saving—about 35 per cent—is made in the form of brewers' grains used to feed cattle. Those grains are used and are largely supplied in States like mine, where there is very little farming on a large scale, but where there are many great industrial towns and cities. Our principal agricultural industry is dairy farming. I am informed by one of the great dairy farmers of our State that the dairy farmers have made their contracts for the brewers' grain, containing, as it does, very large amounts of protein. It is too late for them to supply it from other sources; to use the barley would be too expensive; they would not get the results. This is going to affect the entire milk supply of my State, a crowded industrial State, with thousands and thousands of children. The sudden withdrawal at this time of the brewers' grains would be likely to send milch cattle to the slaughterhouse.

Do you realize also—I did not until to-day, when I was told about it, and it will be explained to you more fully later—that closing the breweries is going to reduce the supply of yeast in the country to the extent of 40 per cent, so that you are likely to have the price of bread doubled if you suddenly cut off the supply of yeast?

Mr. President, is it wise, in view of all those circumstances, is it beneficial for the great purpose of winning the war, to destroy all the breweries of the country at a stroke, without warning, without time for adjustment?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I should like to ask the Senator if he has any figures to show what is the percentage of the brewers' grain—that is, the grain that has been brewed—in its relation to the original grain before it is brewed?

Mr. LODGE. Thirty-five per cent is the saving which goes into the fattening of cattle.

Mr. President, I think the same reasoning applies to wine. The provisions of the Senate bill are not only to stop the distillation of liquor, with which I am in entire sympathy, but to destroy the breweries and to give the President power to save the vineyards. I do not like that way of legislating. I have said something about extreme powers. I do not like to see the Congress shirk its own responsibilities. I think it is for us to say, and not push it onto the President and force upon him the odium, if there is any, of doing what I believe he or any man charged with the heaviest administrative responsibilities knows to be necessary. I think Congress ought to send the bill to him with the breweries and vineyards exempted, and not leave it to him to exempt them, so that we can trot home to our constituents and say, "Well, we gave the President power to do it. He did it. I am all in favor of getting rid of it." I think we ought to deal with this ourselves.

But the bill goes further than this. It also gives the President power to commandeer all the whisky now in bonded warehouses. For that the Government would have to pay. With the revenue which you would lose from the whisky now in bond and which is paid when it comes out of bond, and the amount you would have to pay for it when you commandeer it and turn it into alcohol for industrial purposes, it would cost the Government $480,000,000. In addition to that, you are going to lose in round numbers $140,000,000 from the breweries. That is—there is a number of smaller taxes—I leave in wine, which is $10,000,000—which would go with that; but the total would be well over $620,000,000. I hope that those who wish to carry this reform through at every expense and at all costs will remember that we are levying additional taxation amounting to from a billion and a half to a billion eight hundred millions, and think twice before they add that enormous amount of six to seven hundred millions additional.

But, Mr. President, I come back to what I think is the governing consideration, and that which governs me. I do not know whether I am correctly informed or not, but I think I am. It comes to me from Russian sources. The Czar, by an edict, stopped the production of vodka, which is a liquor of enormous alcoholic strength, of the highest intoxicating qualities. I thought, when I heard that, that it was one of the best things ever done. I think so still. I think it was a splendid thing to do. Yet the abolition of vodka was one of the three great stimulating causes which led to the Russian revolution—the food shortage, the stoppage of vodka with the discontent thus caused, and the suspicion that they were to be handed over to Germany. Since the democracy of Russia which we are taking to our arms, and rightly, is coming forward, vodka, I understand, under modified conditions, is again allowed to be sold.

Germany, so far as I know, has done nothing for the prohibition or the restriction of alcoholic beverages in any way; and I think everybody will admit that the fighting quality of the German Army has been pretty good. I think they have fought as well as men could fight, even if they had nothing but ice water to drink. France has stopped absinthe, a poisonous cordial. She gives her men a pint of light wine every day, I believe. I believe, also, the English give something stronger every week to their men. They certainly give them an abundance of beer. Now, those men have done, on all sides, the greatest fighting the world has ever seen, and it is idle to say that the fact that a man drinks beer or light wines is going to unfit him to fight. That is the experience which they have had.

I refer to this merely as affecting military efficiency, of which we hear so much.

I wish, I repeat, to have all the making of distilled liquors stopped. I wish to conserve the grain, and I wish to stop the making of liquors in this country while this war is going on. I want to see that done, and I shall vote for anything that does it; but I hope the Senate will pause before they go further. Do not let us forget the united enthusiastic public sentiment which we must have to win this war, more important even than money, more important than anything else.

Our troops, Mr. President, are there. There never were any finer troops on the face of the earth than those who landed yesterday, or the day before, in France. There will be a month of silence while they are getting ready, and then some day will come the news that they have stormed a German trench or taken a French village. There will come a list of deaths and a list of casualties, of dead and wounded. Blood will be on the faces and on the garments of the American people then; and let me say to you that whatever clamor may be raised now, there is one thing the American people will not forgive and that is any failure to do everything we can to win this war, or any action which divides opinion and sentiment at home.

During the delivery of Mr. LODGE's speech,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts will suspend for a moment. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 2463) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside, and that the bill now under consideration be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

After the conclusion of Mr. LODGE's speech,

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, if I correctly understand the parliamentary situation, the Senator from Oregon has substituted the House bill as reported with Senate amendments, and that is the pending bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The House bill is before the Senate.

Mr. HARDWICK. As reported from the Senate committee?

The VICE PRESIDENT. As reported from the Senate committee.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, it is my purpose on a different occasion and at a later date to address the Senate somewhat at length with reference to this bill. There are many of its provisions that I can not support. There are many of its sections for which I will be unable to vote. I want to say, however, that in my opinion the Senate committee has greatly improved the bill from what it was when it passed the other House of Congress. I particularly congratulate the Senate committee on the adoption of section 3, which provides that these various gentlemen who from patriotic motives are serving the Government in an advisory capacity in connection with the Council of National Defense shall not sell their own wares to the Government while they are acting as its next friends. That section alone makes the bill of some value.

There are, however, at least two sections of this bill that, in my judgment, no Senator of the United States can support if he believes that the organic law of the land still lives, if he believes that there is still in existence a Constitution of the United States which he has sworn at that desk to support. My purpose now is to make a motion to recommit certain sections of this bill to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry in the hope that the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry may remedy the situation somewhat by removing these sections that we can not constitutionally pass and leaving the bill so that the Senate can take it up and put it in the best possible shape, and then take its own judgment and its own course about it.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry, if the Senator pleases.

Mr. HARDWICK. Certainly.

Mr. KENYON. Is the House bill now before the Senate?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

I have been somewhat in doubt in my own mind, Mr. President, as to whether a motion to recommit certain sections of a pending bill would be in order, the motion of course not going to the whole bill; but a somewhat careful examination into the situation convinces me that the motion I propose to make, to recommit to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry certain sections of the bill that I will name and read, is in order.

In the first place, I call the attention of the Chair and of the Senate to Rule XXVI of the Senate, which provides that—

When motions are made for reference of a subject to a select committee or to a standing committee, the question of reference to a standing committee shall be put first; and a motion simply to refer shall not be open to amendment, except to add instructions.

The important part of that language is that the rule says, not a motion to recommit, or to commit—which is the same thing—a bill or a resolution, but a subject; and I am convinced that that language was not used unadvisedly or hastily or carelessly in the Senate rules and by the men who framed the Senate rules, because I find that in Mr. Jefferson's Manual of Parliamenary Practice the following is stated to be the practice among English-speaking peoples:

After a bill has been committed and reported, it ought not, in an ordinary course, to be recommitted; but in cases of importance and for special reasons it is sometimes recommitted, and usually to the same committee. If a report be recommitted before agreed to in the House, what has passed in committee is of no validity; the whole question is again before the committee and a new resolution must be again moved, as if nothing had passed.

In the Senate, January, 1800, the salvage bill was recommitted three times after the commitment.

A particular clause of a bill may be committed without the whole bill, or so much of a paper to one and so much to another committee.

So I submit that the motion I shall make rests on ample parliamentary authority. If there are any precedents of the Senate to the contrary, a somewhat hasty examination has not disclosed them to me.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If I may interrupt the Senator, I propose to make a point of order against the motion to recommit any portion of the bill, unless the motion is directed to the bill itself. I concede the power of the Senate to recommit the whole bill, but I question the power and deny the authority to recommit any portion of the bill; and I call the Senator's attention to Rule XV of the Senate rules.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the Senator direct my attention to the language on which he relies?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; the second paragraph of it provides:

When a bill or resolution shall have been ordered to be read a third time, it shall not be in order to propose amendments, unless by unanimous consent, but it shall be in order at any time before the passage of any bill or resolution to move its commitment; and when the bill or resolution shall again be reported from the committee it shall be placed on the calendar, and when again considered by the Senate it shall be as in Committee of the Whole.

In other words, the power is vested in the Senate to recommit the whole bill, but not to recommit any portion of it, because there is no provision in the rules of the Senate authorizing the recommittal of a portion of a bill.

Mr. HARDWICK. Can the Senator cite me any Senate precedent on that question? The rule itself, of course, would not negative the text of Mr. Jefferson's Manual.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I can not. The Senator is making a motion which seems to be in conflict with the rule itself. Can the Senator point out any precedent that authorizes it?

Mr. HARDWICK. I have cited authority. I have not found any decision of the Senate itself one way or the other.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is a decision.

Mr. HARDWICK. Can the Chair direct my attention to it, and will the Chair do so?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes. It was decided on May 9, 1906, as follows:

The Senate resumed the consideration of a bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission. There was pending an amendment proposed by Mr. John F. Dryden, of New Jersey, which had been amended by the Senate on motion of Mr. Stephen B. Elkins, of West Virginia. Mr. Albert J. Hopkins, of Illinois, moved to refer the amendment as amended to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. Mr. Joseph W. Bailey, of Texas, made the point of order that the amendment might not be committed to a committee.

Then follows the discussion. The question was submitted to the Senate, and upon the roll of the Senate being called as to whether the amendment could or could not be committed to the committee it resulted in a vote of yeas 25, nays 48.

The Chair is clearly of the opinion that the ruling of the Senate was right, and that Rule XXVI is not applicable at the present time; that the order of procedure comes under Rule XXII. The pending question at the present time would be as to whether the bill should be reported to the Senate, it now being before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. This rule provides that when that is the condition of the record—

No motion shall be received but to adjourn, to adjourn to a day certain, * * * to take a recess, to proceed to the consideration of executive business, to lay on the table, to postpone indefinitely, to postpone to a day certain, to commit, to amend.

Now, as it appears to the mind of the Chair, this will be the remedy of the Senator from Georgia——

Mr. HARDWICK. The Chair will understand that I have not made any motion yet. I merely expressed my intention to make a motion later.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair might as well express the opinion, however——

Mr. HARDWICK. I understand, and I am very glad to have the Chair's opinion, although I do not agree with him at all.

The VICE PRESIDENT (continuing). That the way to reach the question, which the Chair does believe would be in order, would be to move to rerefer the bill to the committee with instructions to strike out certain sections.

Mr. HARDWICK. I quite agree with the Chair; and while I believe that the rule stated by Mr. Jefferson's Manual is applicable in the Senate, and I do not believe that the precedent cited by the Chair is applicable or in point, it will be useless and futile to take up the time of the Senate upon a moot question.

Mr. President, at some other time, when we have more time to spare, I am going to undertake to have that question settled by the Senate; and I believe, on authority, that the position cited, taken by Mr. Jefferson, is sound and is applicable to just such a situation as this. As the Chair has very well suggested, that is a moot question. We can raise the question just as well by a motion to recommit or by a motion to recommit with instructions. So far as I am concerned, I do not intend, unless some other Senator desires to adopt that course, to move to recommit with instructions; but I do intend before I take my seat to move to recommit this bill, and I do intend to move to recommit this bill because of certain sections in it to which I wish to invite the attention of the Senate now.

Mr. President, section 4 of this bill provides—

That it is hereby made unlawful for any person willfully to destroy any necessaries for the purpose of enhancing the price or restricting the supply thereof; knowingly to commit waste or willfully to permit preventable deterioration of any necessaries in or in connection with their production, manufacture, or distribution; to hoard, as defined in section 6 of this act, any necessaries; to monopolize or attempt to monopolize, either locally or generally, any necessaries; to engage in any discriminatory and unfair, or any deceptive or wasteful practice or device, or to make any unjust or unreasonable rate or charge, in handling or dealing in or with any necessaries; to conspire, combine, agree, or arrange with any other person, (a) to limit the facilities for transporting, producing, harvesting, manufacturing, supplying, storing, or dealing in any necessaries; (b) to restrict the supply of any necessaries; (c) to restrict distribution of any necessaries; (d) willfully to prevent, limit, or lessen the manufacture or production of any necessaries in order to enhance the price thereof, or (e) to exact excessive prices for any necessaries. Any person who violates any of the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be fined in a sum not exceeding $10,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding two years, or both.

Mr. President, on a later occasion I think I can demonstrate to the Senate that practically every one of these propositions is already the law of the land; that, as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has well said, all this clamor about getting after the food manipulator and the food speculator is baseless and unfounded, because we have, as far as laws can control and remedy the situation, plenty of laws on the statute books to do that already, and we do not need any additional statutes to accomplish that result; or, if we did, if Congress had not already exercised its powers to their full limit in this respect, in a bill that we passed on the 1st day of June we incorporated a provision expressly dealing with and amply covering this entire subject. So that whatever else may be said for or against this bill, its proponents are not to be permitted to stand before the country insisting on the false premise that the object and purpose of this bill is to relieve the poor, suffering consumer from the food speculator and the food manipulator, for such is not the case and such is not the truth, and it is time the American people were knowing it.

I contend that the language employed in this bill in section 4 makes the law that you propose to enact applicable not only to the provisions of interstate and foreign commerce, which is the full limit of the power of Congress, but to every internal and domestic concern in every single one of the 48 States and all of the Territories of the United States. In other words, it makes all of the acts specified in this section offenses against the laws of the United States, even if they occur entirely within a State, and entirely with reference to a product that never is intended, even, to enter interstate commerce, and never does, in fact, so enter interstate commerce. It applies to every process of domestic production and of domestic and internal life in every one of the States.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] suggested a very grave doubt as to whether the Constitution of the United States really had any vigor and force left. I am going to assume for the purposes of this argument, and in this body, among men who have sworn to support it, not only in peace but in war, that it still has some force and some effect, in conscience and in morals, at least, among honorable men. The Constitution is the supreme law of the land in peace and war alike; and not one of us swore at that desk to support it only in times of peace and to violate it whenever we pleased in times of war. It would be a poor instrument, little worthy of the great encomiums that have been heaped upon it, and so worthily heaped upon it, I believe, if it were so worthless, so inadequate, that it did not cover and did not fit a war situation as well as a peace situation; and I can not so concede. The Constitution of the United States is just the same in war as it is in peace.

I now quote from Fifth Wallace, page 841, on the question of the constitutionality of section 4 of the bill:

The twenty-ninth section of the internal-revenue act of March 2, 1867 (14 Stat. L., 484), which makes it a misdemeanor, punishable by fine and imprisonment, to mix for sale naphtha and illuminating oils, or to sell or offer such mixture for sale, or to sell or offer for sale oil made of petroleum for illuminating purposes, inflammable at less temperature or fire test than 110° F., is in fact a police regulation relating exclusively to the internal trade of the States.

The Chief Justice, delivering the opinion of the court, said:

The questions certified resolve themselves into this: Has Congress power, under the Constitution, to prohibit trade within the limits of a State?

That Congress has power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes the Constitution expressly declares. But this express grant of power to regulate commerce among the States has always been understood as limited by its terms; and as a virtual denial of any power to interfere with the internal trade and business of the separate States, except, indeed, as a necessary and proper means for carrying into execution some other power expressly granted or vested.

So in this case I not only concede it but I assert, because I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts, that the ultimate test of patriotism is that every one of us, Democrats or Republicans, Senators of the United States all, will do all in our power to win this war, and I know there is no Senator in this Chamber who would not do all in his power, justly, honestly, and earnestly to further the cause of our great country in this great emergency. So I say I not only concede but claim that the President of the United States might do many things internally within a State, to provision an army, to supply a navy, or to do anything directly and immediately connected with the prosecution of the war, but can it be honestly contended, can it be even earnestly contended by any Senator that because we are in war Congress has the power to say that it is necessary to marshal the Nation's forces, that it is necessary to conserve its industries, that it is necessary to make rules and regulations not to supply the Army or the Navy, not to do anything immediately or even remotely connected with war, except on the theory that it is necessary people shall be fed while the war is going on? It is just as necessary to feed the people in time of peace as it is in time of war, they have to eat, and they eat just as much, I presume, whether it is peace or war, but to contend that the war power can be stretched to that extent is to deny that we have a written Constitution at all.

Section 4 teems with that sort of thing. Everything in it is purely the domestic and internal concern of the States. There is not a word, not a line, not an expression, that limits it to interstate or foreign commerce or that brings it within the purview of the constitutional power of the Government, and, as suggested, and I am glad he suggested it, by the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], most of the States already have laws on the subject. I happen to remember, and I am glad to be able to refer to it on this occasion, that in the statutes of my own State, copied from the common law are the provisions against forestalling, regrating, and engrossing the market, and not only that but by an act of the legislature the judge of every circuit court in Georgia is required to give those sections in charge to the grand jury in every county in our State at least once a year, and I assume that other States have at least some provision on this subject. So far as it comes to these things described in section 4 within a State, unrelated to interstate or foreign commerce and disconnected with either, I say Congress has absolutely no power whatever on what matters that are purely local.

Not only that, but again in the decision of the Supreme Court rendered June a year ago, when the Harrison narcotic law was before the Supreme Court in the case of United States against Jin Fuey Moy, decided December 15, 1916, the court held that the law was constitutional in so far and only so far as it imposed a tax, but that so far as its language indicated an attempt to make the possession of opium or of a narcotic in a State unlawful under Federal law it could not be given that construction, otherwise it must fail.

In Two hundred and forty-first United States, page 395, United States against Jin Fuey Moy will be found the Harrison narcotic law decision. If you will apply that decision to the principles of section 4 there is not a single one of the things that section 4 undertakes to do inside of a State that is not condemned by it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Does not the decision the Senator has just called attention to recognize what all lawyers, I think, ought to concede, namely, that Congress should have the power under the taxing power of the Federal Government to impose a tax on business, and yet not have the regulatory power within a State?

Mr. HARDWICK. Undoubtedly, that was precisely it. I did not read it all, but that is precisely what the opinion was. But the court held in the Harrison narcotic case that the language had apparently attempted to make the possession of a narcotic in any one of the States unlawful in the hands of any person who happened to have any of it, and that it could not be given that construction because it would be unconstitutional if it did. The narcotic was a condemned thing. The necessaries of life we are dealing with are perfectly sound and stable, and you can not get that phase of the question mixed up with this.

Not only that, but there is another decision to which I wish to direct your attention, and that is the License Tax cases reported in Fifth Wallace. I shall read what the court held there. This is the case, I think, that the Senator from Utah had in mind. It is one of the leading cases, and illustrates the principle he had in his mind even better than the other. The license act was passed June 30, 1864.

Mr. GORE. During the Civil War.

Mr. HARDWICK. As the Senator from Oklahoma suggests, this act was passed by the United States Congress when the country was engaged in the Civil War in 1864, and whatever war powers we had were just as ample and just as complete as they are to-day. The court held in the License Tax cases, decided in Fifth Wallace:

1. Licenses under the act of June 30, 1864, "to provide internal revenue to support the Government, etc." (13 Stat. L., 223), and the amendatory acts, conveyed to the licensee no authority to carry on the licensed business within a State.

Just so the tax provision does not give the person who is taxed any warrant or authority to carry on his business in violation of a local State law or local regulation. That is perfectly true with reference to the liquor question, as my friend from Utah knows.

Now, Senators, unless you are prepared to say there is no longer a Constitution of the United States in force or that the power in Congress to raise armies and to do things like that, the war powers are so broad that while we are raising an army we can do anything under heaven that appears to us to promote the general welfare and general happiness of the people, then there is no warrant whatever for this section and nothing upon which it can be based.

There is one other section in this bill which, I think, is in even a worse condition, section 11, I think it is now in the new print—

That, whenever the President shall find that an emergency exists requiring stimulation of production—

Where the minimum-price guaranty is provided it is provided here:

When the President finds that the importation into the United States of any such product produced outside of the United States materially enhances or is likely materially to enhance the liabilities of the United States under guaranties of prices therefore made pursuant to this section, and ascertains what rate of duty, added to the then existing rate of duty on any such product and to the value of such product at the time of importation, would be sufficient to bring the price thereof at which imported up to the price fixed therefor pursuant to the foregoing provisions of this section, he shall proclaim such facts, and thereafter—

That is, upon his proclamation—

there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon such product when imported, in addition to the then existing rate of duty, the rate of duty so ascertained.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] made reference to this matter the other day. We have delegated to the President, and under very different circumstances from which Congress has ever delegated any other agencies, the power to legislate, a power essentially and fundamentally different from what we delegated to the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix reasonable and just rates according to the exact yardstick that we furnished them, a power to levy a tax or not to levy it. We not only have violated the Constitution of the United States, if we should pass this bill, in delegating to another a power that has been confided to us but we have delegated the power to levy taxes, a power the most valuable of all to English-speaking people, a power for which Englishmen and Americans have fought and bled and died before they would submit to have it exercised by anyone else except by the directly chosen representatives of the people themselves, a power over the purse, a power to destroy, and a power to secure and defend and preserve and maintain the liberties of the people. The men who made this Constitution, which has been sneered at so much, abused so much, and violated so often, would not even let the Senate of the United States originate legislation with respect to taxation. That kind of legislation can not be originated even in this body representing the sovereign States of the American Union. Yet instead of delegating that to some one else rather than to the chosen representatives of the people——

Mr. KENYON. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield.

Mr. KENYON. I am interested in the question the Senator is discussing. Does not the Senator believe that in this bill we have limited it, giving the President the power to ascertain a fact, and we are levying the tax?

Mr. HARDWICK. I have not been able to form that opinion. If I did, I think it might be defended.

Mr. KENYON. That is really the crux of the matter, is it not? We could delegate it to him to this effect, not to legislate.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; if we followed the same plan and the same principle that was followed in creating the Interstate Commerce Commission; if we conferred upon the President the precise rule, upon the ascertainment of facts that such and such should be the law.

Mr. KENYON. That is what we propose to do in this section.

Mr. HARDWICK. Does the Senator think that is all that is done?

Mr. KENYON. If I was called upon to pass on it, I think I would want to consider it; I think it is a very doubtful question. I believe it has been brought under that rule, but it is rather far-fetched, I think.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. If the language employed in this proposed law brings the matter within the rule referred to, then I see no reason why we might not say in any statute that whenever the President shall find that the prices of American products are lower than he thinks they ought to be he may impose a tax great enough to raise them to a price as high as he thinks they ought to command. If that be true, there is no reason in the world why Congress might not simply pass the taxing power over to the President by pursuing the course indicated.

Mr. HARDWICK. Let me interject this right in this connection. If that same language was employed here, then the Senator might sustain that contention, but it reads:

When the President finds that the importation into the United States of any such product produced outside of the United States materially enhances or is likely materially to enhance the liabilities of the United States under guaranties of prices therefor made pursuant to this section—

In other words, we leave him to be the judge of something that may or may not happen, and we leave it for him not to ascertain the fact that has already happened, thus to constitute himself the judge of what is going to happen in the future, and if he believes that a certain thing may happen, although in point of fact it may never happen, then the President of the United States is to impose this tax.

Mr. KENYON. Then would the Senator believe if the words "materially to enhance" were stricken from the bill the constitutionality would be settled.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator is asking me a fair question, and I want to give him a fair answer. It would present a more doubtful question to me. With the Senator from Missouri I do not believe we have any right to delegate this great taxing power that the Constitution makers were so jealous of that they would not even let us in this body originate legislation in respect to it; and I do not believe we should delegate it to anybody outside of Congress.

Mr. KENYON. We do not delegate to the President the power to tax, but to determine a fact.

Mr. REED. Oh, Mr. President.

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED We do not fix the tax. There is not a word in the bill which proposes to have us fix the tax. Circumstances fix the fact—that is the best you can say for it—but those circumstances are to be judged by the President.

Mr. HARDWICK. Exactly; the President is to sit in mental judgment over what the circumstances are. He is to decide about it; he is to exercise his mind, his will, his conscience, and his judgment, not the conscience and judgment of Congress, in determining what these facts are; and it not only went that far but went so far as to say that if the fact has not already happened and you think it is likely to happen, then you can tax the people of the United States in this way. I do not think the Senator from Iowa, who is an able, conscientious legislator, can even contend that.

Mr. President, I do not care to take up a great deal of the time of the Senate at present——

Mr. REED. Will the Senator let me interrupt him?

Mr. HARDWICK. Certainly.

Mr. REED. The Senator expresses some wonderment that the committee seemed to think it could delegate power to the President to levy taxes. I wish to call the Senator's attention to the language of section 10, where they have undertaken to control not methods and processes by which a thing may occur, but they have actually undertaken to stop prices from rising or prices from changing by enacting a law. Section 10 of the last print—it is section 12 of the first print—reads:

That undue enhancement or fluctuation of prices * * * are hereby prohibited.

Of course there are some other things that are prohibited, but the whole clause reads:

That undue enhancement or fluctuation of prices of, or injurious speculation in, or unjust market manipulation or unfair and misleading market quotations of the prices of necessaries, are hereby prohibited.

But along with the other things which might possibly be reached by human agency we find that these legislators have actually proposed to prohibit by law prices from rising or prices from falling or prices from changing, and as such power as that was assumed by the House of Representatives and the legislation was carefully prepared and sent to us, I think the Senator need not be astonished if the Constitution is occasionally ravished.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am learning, and I am getting accustomed to it, although I do not much enjoy seeing it done even yet. Mr. President, I think the demonstration must be complete to any Senator's mind who has considered this matter that there are some things in these sections that are certainly unconstitutional, if we have any Constitution left. If they are, the bill ought to go back to the committee, so that they can take these two sections out of it, or most of the two sections. It ought to go back to the committee, in my judgment, also, so that it can deal with the question suggested last by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], this liquor question, always a troublesome question, one that gives us a great deal of concern in this body.

And yet, Mr. President, I feel that the Senator from Massachusetts has stated that question correctly. In the first place, it ought not to be connected with this great war measure, if it is in truth and in fact a war measure. I feel also that the Senator from Massachusetts is right, that we ought not in any event or under any circumstances to go so far on this question now, when our people are engaged in a great struggle with a foreign foe, that we will dissatisfy and render discontented millions of people throughout the Republic who do not believe in this legislation and are just as conscientious in their objections to it, just as earnest in their opposition to it, as any man is in his advocacy of it.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I should like to suggest to the Senator that this legislation ought to be enacted and disposed of. I do not think that it would facilitate the matter to refer it back to the committee. Why not let the Senate go ahead and determine it and thrash it out here? The country is becoming impatient for action on this subject and I for one want to have action taken. Let the bill be passed at the earliest proper moment.

Mr. HARDWICK. If we would refer it to the committee to-day, I think we could get it back by to-morrow. I do not want delay either. If the Senator will let me say a word or two in my own time, I do not want to delay it, but I want to get it right, and not rush it through here, right or wrong.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. HARDWICK. We ought not to be in such a hurry. I think the bill ought to go back to the committee, and let the committee take out provisions which they admit themselves are unconstitutional.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I am not asking for any hasty or unduly expeditious action. I think the bill ought to be maturely considered. It is a matter of far-reaching consequence. Of course the question is not one to be very hastily disposed of as long as the provision is in the bill stopping the manufacture of beer. The advocates of the saloon and brewery can be depended upon to fight to the bitter end. That provision I desire to keep in the bill. I think the one thing that is going to contribute more to the strength of the American Army is soberness, and I think another thing that is going to contribute to the strength of the American people is the economy that is going to be promoted by stopping the manufacture of intoxicating liquors. We need a sober army and we must have a sober, economical citizenry in order to carry the war to a successful end. I do not think anybody is particularly interested in defeating the prohibition provision in this bill except those who would profit pecuniarily by the manufacture and sale of the damnable stuff.

Mr. HARDWICK. I realize the force of that suggestion, but opinions are so widely divergent and honest convictions are so widely apart that it will not matter much what the committee does, Senators still must settle it, and settle it on this floor. As far as that section is concerned, I would just as soon settle that now as at any other time, but I do think, above all things, we ought not to have this bill before us where we may have to vote for it or against it as a whole with these sections in it concerning which I do not believe a single Senator can make a serious argument that they are constitutional. As my friend from Oklahoma suggested, Senators ought not to be put in a position where they can not vote for it without violating their sense of obligation to the Constitution.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KENYON. Why can not the Senator accomplish the same purpose by merely moving to strike out the sections or parts of the sections? It would merely result in delay to send it back to the committee. The committee have done all they can do. We have worked it out as far as we can, and the Senate can work it out on the floor as well as the committee.

Mr. HARDWICK. The trouble is that when we undertake to do that we are met with the statement that that is not the way to legislate, that legislation must be worked out in committee and must be carefully correlated and connected. So we are caught between the two horns of a dilemma. If we say we will not send it back to the committee to connect and correlate it and get it into shape, the committee has done all that it can do, and when we come to the floor and want to make this change we are met with the claim that it requires consideration and it must go to the committee room for consideration. The power and strength of that argument and the common sense of that suggestion impel me to make the motion to recommit so that the committee may correct the palpable mistakes that have been made in the bill. I know of no way to get the sense of the Senate on the question except to make a motion to recommit, and I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, my colleague and I represent one of the largest grain-producing States, the largest milling State, and the largest iron-ore producing State in the Union. We are vitally interested in the provisions of this bill, and while I shall not take much of the time of the Senate to discuss it I believe I owe it to my constituency to state the reasons why I am willing to vote to grant a reasonable control over the supply and distribution of the various essential commodities, and to point out the danger of disaster to our industries which an unwise exercise of these powers might entail.

Mr. President, we are, I believe, by this bill launching this Government into unknown fields of activity, invoking the principles of governmental paternalism heretofore untried. We are about to change the industrial and economic principles upon which our great fabric has been reared. Nothing but a supreme necessity vital to the very life of this Nation would induce me to lay the hands of the Government upon the production, distribution, and sale of the leading commodities of this country. It is unnecessary for me to take the time of the Senate to call attention to the magnitude of that struggle and to our vital interest in the final issue. It has been done many times on this floor.

This great war, involving as it does nearly the whole civilized world, surpassing in its intensity, its crimes, and its horrors the darkest pages of history, calls upon us to arm the National Government with all the power and resources within our command. I am not disturbed by forebodings of disaster to come from granting away our liberties. I am more disturbed about the loss of them in the great arbitrament of war. Should the issue be determined in favor of the allied governments, there is no danger of a dictator or a continuance of the powers we have granted for war purposes. They will expire and this people can resume the activities and arts of peace and bind up the wounds of a distracted world. There is more danger of imperiling individual activity and enterprise which have through centuries been the guiding star to the great achievements of the Anglo-Saxon race.

We should in the passage of these laws and in their execution bear in mind that if this country is to be prosperous and bear the great burdens of this struggle we must interfere as little as possible with the activities and the business of the people, and must preserve individual opportunity and individual enterprise. We can not take from the people of the country the opportunity to make reasonable profits or take from them that opportunity which they have to manage their own business in the ordinary way without imperiling their individual enterprise; but, Mr. President, it is necessary in times like these to conserve our resources, to protect the people from unreasonable burdens, and to marshal the assets of the Nation so that they may be most effective in the prosecution of the war.

It has been represented to us by those in immediate charge of the war that if we hope to succeed we must insure to our allies a sufficient food supply, a supply of the principal commodities absolutely necessary to the prosecution of the war; that we must insure to our own people those necessaries of life which are indispensable to our existence at prices within the reach of the people; that, owing to the destruction by the war, the decrease of production, the want of transportation upon the ocean, and losses due to the submarine, we are confronted with a scarcity of provisions and many of the commodities necessary to maintain the armies; that the ordinary principles of supply and demand and the machinery of our great industrial fabric have broken down; and that it is temporarily necessary for the Government to take control of production, distribution, and sale in order that the Army and the Navy may be maintained, as well our own as those of our allies. I know this is denied by Senators upon this floor, to whose discussion of this question I have listened with absorbing interest, and I have had at times grave doubts, and have now, of the wisdom of some of these laws, which, unless wisely administered, may bring industrial disaster to this country. But I am not willing to take the chance of defeating this legislation; I am going to resolve the doubt in favor of the grant of power and trust to the wisdom of the men who will have these laws to administer, as we must do in times of great emergency when calling into play the war powers of the Nation.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. As I understand the Senator from Minnesota, he takes the position that governmental control of the productive instrumentalities of the Nation would be advantageous. Does not the Senator think, from his great knowledge of economics and the rules governing industrial activity, that the assumption by the Government of the productive instrumentalities of the Nation would tend rather to retard productivity than to increase it? In other words, with the high prices that the war and the introduction into our currency of a larger volume have produced, does not the Senator think that those causes, together with some others, will so stimulate production that by private enterprise and private control there will be a far greater production not only of manufactured products but of farm products than if the Government itself should lay its hands upon the productive enterprises of this country? Does not the Senator think if he will pardon me a further question, if the Government should attempt to control the productive fountains of this Nation, that, first, the cost would be greatly increased, and, secondly, that it would result in a diminished output rather than in an increased production?

Mr. KELLOGG. I do. I do not think it is possible or advisable for the Government to take over the production in this country or a general control of all the productive activities, and regulate them. I believe that, so far as possible, it is wise not to interfere with the ordinary business of the people. I do believe, however, that in times of rising prices and extraordinary demands, some steps should be taken by the Government to control distribution and sale, to prevent hoarding and unreasonable speculation, to encourage production, and perhaps to control the export of products out of this country, in order that our allies may be reasonably supplied, and that our resources be not dissipated by a scramble to purchase by foreign countries in a general market.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. The Senator has permitted an interruption of his remarks, and perhaps, therefore, it would not disconcert him if I should ask him at this time if he does not believe that the question of the control or the keeping out of our markets of the foreign purchaser, and thus the scramble, that he has just referred to, being prevented, has already been taken care of by the bill which gives the President the absolute right to declare embargoes, and by the further provision, which is already in force, of a purchase by the allies through one common agency? Does not the Senator think that question has now been pretty well taken care of?

Mr. KELLOGG. I think it has been. I am perfectly willing to answer any question which I may be asked, but I should prefer if Senators would wait until I get through with my remarks.

Mr. REED. Very well.

Mr. KELLOGG. I think that matter has been taken care of by the embargo powers which have been granted to the President; but, as I was saying, we must to some extent trust to the wisdom of the men who will have these laws to administer, as we must do in times of great emergency when calling into play the war powers of the Nation.

CONSTITUTIONAL POWER.

After the very illuminating speech of the junior Senator from Iowa I shall not stop to discuss at any length the constitutional power of Congress to enact and carry into effect the provisions of this bill. It is to my mind clearly within the power of Congress, or at least the main provisions of the bill are clearly within those powers. I do not, of course, believe that during the war the Constitution or any one of its provisions is suspended; but the power to declare and carry on war necessary to the preservation of the Nation and to enact all legislation to carry this power into effect is of equal force with all the other provisions and limitations of the Constitution. In fact, these provisions are not subordinate to the declaration of rights or any of the other constitutional protections, for the power of self-preservation is the highest prerogative of government. The power to conscript property, to fix prices, to encourage or go into the field of production, in fact to do anything necessary to preserve the supplies necessary to the support of the people during the war and to lend strength to the cause are powers as necessary to the defense of a nation as the power to raise, equip, and feed an army.

Of course, no one will claim that because war exists Congress should disregard entirely constitutional restrictions. It may not abolish State governments, or the Federal Government, or change the office or prerogatives of the President, but it may produce, conserve, purchase, and fix the price of all products necessary to carry on the war, and to maintain the Nation in a high state of efficiency during the struggle.

Personally I can see no difference between the power to conscript property to equip and feed an army and the power to encourage production or, if necessary, to produce property to maintain the people who constitute the Nation back of the armies.

Whenever it is necessary—and, of course, this is a question of necessity—for this Government to marshal its resources or encourage production, to regulate prices, and to protect the people, in order that their power may be greater in time of war—in other words, whenever it is necessary to preserve the national life—Congress may do it. It is not because the Constitution or any provision of it is suspended, or the constitutional limitations and protections of the Bill of Rights are suspended, but because in the exercise of that provision of the Constitution the Nation has power to preserve its existence and to protect its life.

I am not disturbed about the provisions of this bill so far as constitutional power of the Government is concerned. It may be that the provision of section 12, which provides for levying an import tax, may be upon the border line of constitutional power. I suppose the effect of that provision is this: The Government proposes to fix a minimum price for farm products in order to encourage production—I hope it will never be necessary to do so—but suppose the Government should fix minimum prices in this country to encourage production, it would be necessary in order to maintain that price to levy a tax on imports equal to the difference between the selling price of the imported product and the price so fixed. The Congress by law determines the tax and enacts that it shall be equal to such difference in order to maintain the Government minimum price. It then leaves to the President the power to determine the fact from time to time as to the amount of the difference and the circumstances under which the law of Congress shall go into effect. In substance, this is an illustration of the power of Congress to provide for a tax and leave it to the President or any other authority to find the existence of a state of facts which shall bring into effect the act of Congress. In the same way Congress enacts any other tariff duty and provides that if the President shall determine that any foreign country is discriminating against this country he may by proclamation announce the fact and impose the duty. I will admit that this goes to the border line of constitutional power. The wisdom of it, of course, is for Congress to settle.

I should like, before passing from this subject, to say as to section 5, embodying the power to license persons and corporations engaged in importation, exportation, storage, and distribution of necessaries, that I do not think that power rests necessarily upon the commerce clause of the Constitution. I believe it rests upon the same provisions of the Constitution which enables this Government in time of war to conserve its resources, its food supply, to protect the people and maintain the Army and the Navy. We are not called upon to base the validity of that section upon the commerce clause of the Constitution, and I am not sure that it is wise to include it in the bill.

POLICY OF THE LAW.

I am much more concerned about the policy of some of these laws than I am about their constitutionality, and I wish now briefly to discuss some of the provisions of this bill. First, let me say I can see no reason, if we are going to authorize the Government to regulate the price, production, and sale of food products, why we should not extend the same authority to coal, iron, steel, petroleum, and the other products which are as necessary to the maintenance of the Army and as vital to the very existence of this and the allied nations as are food products. I am pleased to see that the committee has included in section 1 of this bill these various products.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I was just going to call his attention to the fact that the articles enumerated by the Senator are all designated under the bill as "necessaries." The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] was mistaken when he said that agricultural products were the only ones that were taken care of, and for which minimum prices would be fixed.

Mr. KELLOGG. I thank the Senator from North Dakota, but I am coming to that provision. I only suggest that these necessaries should be included in one other provision of this bill, which I will discuss in a few moments.

I do not see why we should not extend it to fertilizers, binding twine, and the other products which are necessary to the production of food products as arms and munitions are to the Army. These, too, have been included in the first section of the bill, and should be included in another section, to which I will call the attention of the Senate. If we are to lay the hand of the Government upon the products of the farm, let us not pause for fear of injuring industry by laying it upon the producer of the principal commodities necessary to the Army and to the people of this country. Why fix a price for food products and allow an unlimited price to be charged for iron, steel, copper, coal, and other products?

I think the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] was mistaken when he said, as I understood him, that the farmer was exempted from the terms of this bill. Under section 1, section 5, for licensing elevators, and under another section of this bill, to which I call attention, granting to the Government power to purchase food products and fuel, the Government may fix the price of the farmer's wheat. When the Government controls absolutely elevators and controls all the purchases of wheat under conditions imposed by the President it controls the farmer's price just as effectively as though Congress passed a law naming the price at the farmer's market station. If we are going into the price-fixing business, there are other articles besides wheat and flour which need regulation and price fixing.

The main reason urged for the passage of this bill is the scarcity of the world's supply of the principal food products, which, unless conserved now under governmental control, will be insufficient to meet the needs of ourselves and our allies, and unless the price is controlled will put many of the necessaries of life beyond the reach of the mass of the people. This same reason applies to coal, iron, steel, fertilizer, and many other commodities.

I shall not indulge in reciting statistics to show this scarcity. I have examined the subject with great care, and I am satisfied that in many of these principal products there is a scarcity and such an abnormal demand as will probably require governmental control during this emergency.

As to the farm products, the decrease of production caused by the war, want of fertilizer in European countries, decrease of man power, failure of crops in this country and in Argentina, inability to ship from Australia and Russia and other distant countries, and the destruction of vessels by the submarine has not only caused a shortage in the world supply, but has, during the last few months, created a condition of panic in the world exchanges and caused abnormal prices.

It is now stated by Government officials who have made the best estimate possible that, with good crops in Canada and the United States, the allied countries will need 1,000,000,000 bushels of grains of all kinds, and, with the supplies we must furnish to neutral countries, there will not be that amount available. The successful prosecution of the war, therefore, not only requires a most rigid conservation of foodstuffs, but a concentration in Government hands of the purchase of foodstuffs for export to the allied and neutral countries and an elimination of speculation, hoarding, and other devices which tend to unreasonably enhance prices.

I am aware, as suggested by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], that the President has power, under the embargo clause of a law which has been passed, to refuse to permit any food products to go to any foreign countries unless those countries and purchasers in those countries consent to purchase their supplies through a central purchasing agency provided by this Government. I believe, to prevent speculation and abnormal increase of prices, that is one of the most beneficial laws this Congress has enacted.

I am aware of the fact that the enormous increase in the price of food products has imposed great hardships upon the people of this country; that the price of many of the necessaries of life in the cities to the man whose wages or whose salary has not been increased has placed these necessaries almost beyond his reach; but the increase in prices has not been confined to food products alone, for there have been great increases in the prices of the other principal products, such as iron, coal, steel, clothing, and so forth. I wish here to warn the Members of this Senate, the Executive of this Nation, and the men who will be intrusted with carrying out the provisions of this bill, that, if the powers so granted are used simply to depress unduly the price of farm products, while permitting everything the farmer has to buy and these other products of the country necessary to the life of the Nation and the maintenance of our armies in the war to remain at exorbitantly high levels, national disaster will inevitably follow.

It is well for us to pause and examine the reasons for the decline in the production of agricultural products in this country. We know that at the close of the Civil War substantially 75 per cent of the people lived upon and obtained their livelihood from the farm, and that to-day only about 35 per cent do so; that continuously, but especially during the last 30 years, the decrease in rural population, as compared with urban population, has been amazing. In 1880 only 29.5 per cent of the people lived in cities of 2,500 inhabitants or more; in 1910, 46 per cent; and, as I have already said, only about 35 per cent of them to-day live upon the farm and obtain their livelihood from agriculture.

The cause is perfectly obvious to anyone. The concentration of wealth, the marvelous accomplishments in science and invention, the increase in manufacture and world commerce, and the increase in communication and rapid transportation have afforded opportunities in the cities for large incomes, the amassing of great fortunes, and that, together with the attractiveness of city life, has taken from the farm much of the best blood of the Nation. In this modern growth of development the farmer's boys have been leaders. Self-reliant, vigorous in body, trained in hardy schools, inspired by ambition, they have, to a large extent, filled the most important positions and have been the leaders in the great accomplishments of our industrial and professional life. Until the farmer is offered equal opportunity for material success and attractiveness in life with the inhabitants of the city, agriculture will continue to decline in proportion to the growth of the Nation.

What I wish to emphasize at this time is that if the Government exercises the power under this bill to unreasonably reduce prices of the principal farm products, this will further discourage production.

That this bill gives the power to fix prices I do not believe is questioned, and that the intention of the authors of this bill is to exercise that power is undoubted. I have not heard discussed anywhere the fixing of any prices except of wheat, and possibly coal, and yet the necessity for fixing the prices and regulating the distribution of other products is just as great as in the case of wheat or any other farm product.

It is recited in subdivision (b) of section 10—and I wish to call the attention of Senators especially to this subdivision—that in order to guarantee reasonable prices to the producer and to the consumer, the President is authorized to purchase, in no case paying less than the minimum price fixed in pursuance of this act, to provide storage facilities for, and to sell at reasonable prices, foods, feeds, and fuels.

Now, I think that language—"foods, feeds, and fuels"—should be stricken out and the word "necessaries," as defined by section 1 of the bill, substituted. It seems to be the only place in the bill where there is expressed an intention of fixing prices, and at present it applies only to foods, feeds, and fuels. It is just exactly as important to fix the prices of fertilizer and binding twine and the other products which the farmer must buy as it is to fix prices of grain he raises on his farm. I know it has been said that the provisions of this bill do not apply to the farmer. They do apply to the farmer, however, and were intended originally to apply to the farmer alone.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator, I think, will note that that subdivision of the section to which he refers contemplates that if it shall become necessary to do so the President or the Government may purchase these articles, whether they be confined to those three or be embraced within a broader scope, upon the open market and sell them at reasonable prices. Does the Senator mean to convey by his remarks upon this particular section that in purchasing those articles the Government should fix the purchase price?

Mr. KELLOGG. I mean to convey the idea that the Government may fix the purchase price under this bill. If, as the Senator says—and I hope it will be so—there is an open market left and the price is reasonable, you will not find the Government purchasing.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Of course the Senator realizes that if the Government does fix the purchase price there is no open market left.

Mr. KELLOGG. Certainly. Now, I am not saying that the men who execute this bill will execute it or carry it out unfairly to the farmer. I can not believe they will do so. I intend to vote for the bill, but I think it is my duty to point out what may be done under it and to sound a note of warning that if you are going to have this Nation great and prosperous you must have the farmer prosperous and independent.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, would it interrupt the Senator if I asked him how there could be an open market for farm products when there is invariably an enormous surplus which must be sent to Europe and when access to the European market is absolutely denied, both under the embargo act and under the arrangement by which the allies will purchase through one agency? Does not that take away the open market or world market, at least, which they have heretofore had?

Mr. KELLOGG. I think it does.

Mr. REED. Perhaps it ought to. I am not saying that it should not.

Mr. KELLOGG. I am coming to that. The President, of course, has power to control the purchases for all foreign countries, and I think it is necessary that he should do so. I do not believe we can afford to permit foreign buyers, neutral countries, allied belligerent countries, to come into our market as they did in April and May last, followed by a line of speculators, buying our products and raising the prices to abnormal height, as they are liable to do, and perhaps imperiling the supply to ourselves and the allied countries. I think we must control not only what goes to the neutral countries, but we must control by one purchaser what goes to the belligerent countries. Of necessity that takes all the surplus in this country, and of necessity that fixes the price, unless there is a most abnormal demand at home; and if there should be such an abnormal demand for domestic uses and milling in this country, it can be handled in this way:

All of the wheat bought in the wheat States of this country is purchased by line or independent elevators along the lines of railroads. Those elevators are owned either by big line elevator companies or by the farmers themselves. In Minnesota, North and South Dakota, and Montana, I believe that the majority of the grain—at least, a very large percentage of it—is purchased by cooperative farmers' elevators. There are over 3,000 independent elevators in those four States, and there are over 5,300 elevators altogether, besides many hundred mills buying at primary markets. Now, when the Government places a license upon every one of those houses, and names the conditions under which the grain may be purchased, of course, having control of the foreign market, it may control the domestic market.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon another interruption?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I dislike to interrupt the Senator, but I have the greatest respect for his opinion and I want to get it. Does not this, then, make it manifest that the power is vested to fix the farmer's price? I think the Senator has already answered that in the affirmative. Now, is there any other place in this bill where there is a serious proposition to fix the prices of other things?

Mr. KELLOGG. I believe it to have been the intention of the committee to confer the same powers upon the President as to all other products; and if in section 5 the bill is amended by striking out the words "foods, feeds, and fuels" and inserting "necessaries," I believe the Government will have the same power as to all of these products.

Mr. REED. The point I am trying to make is this: The Government now has made arrangements absolutely to stop the shipment of food and fuel to Europe, except it shall be through an agency fixed by our Government or the allies. It is a Government-controlled agency. That, of course, will control the price of the food; but is there any such agency to control the price of steel that goes abroad, or other similar products? Have we not left, and do we not propose to leave, the markets of the world open to the steel manufacturer and close the markets of the world to the farmer?

Now I have the question in the form I want it, and I should like to have it elucidated.

Mr. KELLOGG. I hope it is not the intention of the officials of this Government to do that. I can not believe that such is the intention; but if it is, we ought to make sure that the same power shall be given the Government to fix prices of these other products as to fix the prices of wheat.

Now as to the exports: Of course the Government has the same power over exports of steel, iron, and all other products as it has over food products. The President may place an embargo on shipments of any article to any country, and through that embargo, of course, he may control the sale of those articles in foreign countries. Whether or not it is the intention of the President or the officials in control of the subject to do that I can not say.

Mr. REED. It is so important, if the Senator will pardon a further interruption—he has been very generous——

Mr. KELLOGG. I was going to answer further, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. KELLOGG. I believe that as to farm products the Government would largely control their prices through this embargo power; and if all the provisions of this bill are made to apply to all those necessaries there is no reason why the power should not exist in the Government to control the prices as much as in the case of food. Now I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Is it not necessary to go a step further than merely to lodge in the Government the power to control all prices of necessaries going abroad? Should we not make it certain that if the open market, the market of the world, is taken away from the farmer, he should be protected in that which he buys in this market? And is it not necessary to go further than that and provide that if the farmer's world market is taken away from him the same rule shall be applied to the manufacturer of steel or any other prime necessity?

Mr. KELLOGG. I think that should be made clear, and I believe it is clear in this bill that the same power exists to control the markets of the world, so far as exports are concerned, in relation to iron and steel products as in relation to farm products. The only doubt I have is whether necessaries should not be defined in section 5 the same as they are in section 1; and I do not believe the authors of the bill would have any objection to including them.

The prices of agricultural products to the farmer are not as great as the prices of the other leading products of the country, such as iron, steel, copper, coal, and so forth, or the profits of the manufacturers and dealers therein. I am aware that all products have enormously increased in price, due undoubtedly to several contributory causes—inflation in the circulating medium of the world, discussed the other day by the Senator from Missouri; scarcity due to the war, speculation, and unreasonable profits due to the demand exceeding the supply—and all things have combined until it is felt that it is necessary for the Government temporarily to lay the strong hand of the law upon these productive and economic agencies during the war.

The farmer has, to be sure, received good prices in the last two years, but he has not received all the benefits of these high prices. The greater proportion has gone to the middleman, merchant, and speculator.

Take the price of wheat. I send to the desk and ask to have printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks a statement showing the wheat marketed in the principal terminals of Minneapolis, Duluth, Chicago, and Kansas City, together with a list of the prices during the various months of the years 1915, 1916, and 1917.

Take the year 1917, in which we have had such abnormally high prices. The great bulk of the farmer's grain was marketed during the four months of September, October, November, and December. The average prices paid at the terminals during those four months were between $1.40 and $1.75 a bushel, and the farmer received very much less. That was the price at the terminal. From that price was deducted the elevator carrying charges, freight, and so forth. But during the months from January to June of the present year the prices have been all the way from two to three dollars per bushel, and during some of the time considerably over $3 a bushel at the same terminals, during which time the farmer has marketed a small amount of his grain as compared with what he marketed during the four months last fall.

The prices of other products have increased much more than the price of farm products. It is a well-known fact that prices of coal, iron, steel, copper, fertilizer, and petroleum have increased from 100 to 600 per cent in the last two years. So that everything the farmer buys, as well as the great leading products which the Government must buy in enormous quantities to carry on the war, are at abnormally high prices. I am not blaming the manufacturers and dealers for making a good profit; I am simply saying that if we are going to fix the price of farm products let us not stop there, and I warn this Senate that you can not do that without bringing disaster to this country.

I am aware that in this open market there have been speculations, hoardings, and enormous increases in prices, due to the fact that people can get the price; and it is probably necessary—I believe it to be necessary—for the Government to regulate distributing activities. But let us not begin and end our regulation on the farm, because the prosperity of the farmers of this country means the prosperity and the strength of the Nation.

While Congress is considering this question of prices, production and sale, all the great industries of the country, except agriculture, are organized and have their representatives here in Washington to furnish information and look out for their interests. Labor is organized, capital is organized; coal producers and iron manufacturers, dealers, millers, importers, and exporters have all been here and given the various committees their views. I am making no complaint of this. It is perfectly proper and wise that it should be so. Congress can only obtain its information from the men who are engaged in the business to be affected—and I am glad to hear the views of these men—but the farmers are unorganized and unrepresented, except by the men who speak for them on the floors of Congress. I do not know of a single farmer who has been before these committees giving his views as to the cost of raising wheat, or the profits.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me again?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. The Senator speaks of those who have appeared before the committees of Congress. I call his attention to the fact that there is in Washington an advisory committee which is now engaged in buying and conducting negotiations for the purchase of all the immense supplies of our Government, and which, in addition to that, appears to be taking over the control of the market.

Upon that advisory committee all the great business institutions of the country, so far as I know, are represented, and will be represented, I take it, when it comes to the matter of price fixing for the future; but does the Senator know of any potential representation on behalf of the farmer?

Mr. KELLOGG. I am not sure about that. I think I have been informed that on that committee there was a representative of one of the grange organizations of the country. The Senator from North Dakota can give me that information.

Mr. GRONNA. I do not know of any such representative.

Mr. KELLOGG. Well, perhaps not. I am not sure as to that. I do not wish to reflect in the slightest degree upon the gentlemen composing the Council of National Defense. I believe this Government must obtain information and assistance from the business men of the country, and it is not the fault of these other enterprising business men, of course, that the farmer is not represented; but he is in no position to be represented. He is the small holder, the owner and manager of his farm. He is not working eight hours a day; he is working from daylight until dark.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator? I am not so sure but that this bill does that very thing, in section 9. It provides:

> That whenever the President shall find it necessary to secure an adequate supply of necessaries for the support of the Army or the maintenance of the Navy, or for any other public use connected with the common defense, he is authorized to requisition and take over—

And so forth. So that if these plants are charging an unjust price, the Government has the power to take charge of them, and operate them itself.

Mr. KELLOGG. The Government undoubtedly has power to commandeer and to fix the price for all products necessary for the Army and the Navy; and I believe it is the intention of the committee to give the Government the same power to fix the prices of other products, as in the case of wheat and various food products, if it is going into that business.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; and I will say—I do not know whether all of the committee agree with me in this proposition or not; I know, in fact, that one or two of them do not agree with me—but I believe that under the war power vested in Congress by the Constitution they can do almost anything under that provision for any other public use connected with the public defense. I think that under that general power—and that is using the constitutional language—the Government could take these plants and operate them whenever they saw that an unjust burden was being placed upon the farming community or any other portion of the population.

Mr. KELLOGG. It may be that that power exists, but I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill if he would have any objection, under subdivision "(b)," page 11, to including necessaries as defined by subdivision 1 with foods, feeds, and fuels?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will say that I would not have any objection to that. The words "and other supplies" were thought by the committee to be even more comprehensive than the word "necessaries" as embraced within the first section.

Mr. KELLOGG. All I desire is to make sure that that power is there. I have not, of course, had time, since the bill came from the committee yesterday, to examine it critically. I was somewhat familiar with the bill and with the work of the committee before that.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, it seems to me, if the Senator will pardon me, that the farmers have many champions here who can safely be trusted to guard their interests, and a very good representative in the Senator from Minnesota. I hope the farmers are not unrepresented. The Senator from Minnesota has been saying some very valuable things to his colleagues in favor of the farmer, and other Senators do it every day here.

Mr. REED. May I call attention to the fact that the farmers, however, are not making these contracts or controlling these prices?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; but Senators will make the laws, and it is their right to do so under the Constitution.

Mr. REED. Yes; and we are proposing now to make laws turning over to somebody else the question of fixing prices. The point I am calling attention to is that the board or the men who constitute this board that is making these prices will probably control largely in the future, and that there is no farmer there to protect him.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the Senator from Minnesota will pardon me, I simply desired to make that observation because it is so notorious and has been ever since I have been here, that the interests of the farmer are guarded with very great jealousy by Representatives in both Houses of Congress. I have been very much interested in what the Senator from Minnesota has said about the necessity of giving power to fix the prices of products other than food, feed, and fuel. The farmer must have steel if he cultivates his fields and performs the duties that fall to the lot of an agriculturist. He must have those products; and if the Government fixes a low price for steel for its own use and the Government buys what it needs, what will the farmer pay without any compelling power?

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I did not mean to be understood as intimating or holding the opinion that the Members of the Senate and the House have not looked after the interests of the farmer.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, the Senator from Oregon refers to a general power that is distinctly and emphatically conferred. For instance, in our naval bill we gave the President $115,000,000 that he could expend as he saw fit, in addition to the naval program of the Government. We have appropriated $500,000,000 for ships. The Government will be a purchaser to the extent of billions of dollars, and it will buy these products that other citizens may need in order to carry on the industrial and commercial life of the Nation. If the farmers are left with a bare moiety from which to obtain their supplies, with no legislation to aid them, they are bound to pay higher prices than they are paying now, while the price of their own products is to be fixed by law.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I hope to be through in a moment, but I wish to make it perfectly clear that this bill shall not leave the farmer to obtain his supplies at any cost, while protecting the public generally against excessive prices of food products. When we provide for the machinery to protect all the people, including the farmer, we must, of course, leave the execution of the law to the executives of the Nation. Everybody is demanding the reduction of food prices. All the manufacturers and dealers are demanding a reduction in the price of the necessaries of life, except those furnished by themselves. The farmer is in the minority in this country, and I fear that the men who will fix the price of farm products under this bill, if it is done at all, will be the representatives of labor, capital, and industry other than that of farming. I hope not. I can not see why it should be the object of the Government if, looking at this question in its broader light, to unreasonably reduce the prices of farm products. But men are more or less selfish; and I believe that the very foundation of our prosperity and strength in this war rests in the prosperity of the farmers of this country.

While I do not claim to be a spokesman for the farmer, as indicated by the Senator from Michigan——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator is a good representative.

Mr. KELLOGG. I live in a farming community, and in my youth I helped to grub out a living on a frontier farm. Not only do I know farming life from its practical side, but I believe I realize the supreme importance to this Nation of the highest development of agriculture. In all times the prosperity and greatness of the nations of the world have been based upon agricultural pursuits. The roots of all great civilizations spring from the soil.

The degeneration which is going on in the centers of population, like our large cities, is a terrible drain upon the Nation, which is being made good from the blood, sinew, and brain of the land.

Nothing is of greater importance than that we maintain the independence and individual proprietorship, the prosperity, and attractiveness of farm life. It is the small farmer, the owner of the soil, who has enabled France to stand the shock of war and maintain the greatest struggle of all time. Show me a nation whose industries are based upon the independent, prosperous proprietor of the soil and I will show you a great nation. Show me a nation where agriculture declines and I will show you a decadent nation. It has been the history of the world since the doings of men have been recorded. The greatest civilizations have sprung from the fertile valleys and plains of the world.

There are many provisions of this bill besides the price-fixing power which are undoubtedly wise, such as the provisions which eliminate speculation, prevent hoarding and waste, and regulate the storage and handling of products and the sale and distribution thereof. There has undoubtedly been hoarding and undue speculation. I have before me the reports of the United States Department of Agriculture showing the storage of the principal products in the various cold-storage houses in this country in the months of May and June, 1917, as compared with May and June, 1916, the principal products being butter, cheese, eggs, frozen and cured meats; and although there is a shortage in many of these articles and enormous increase in the cost to the people, these statements show a startling increase in the amount in storage over a year ago. In frozen poultry the increase in June, 1917, over June, 1916, was 487.3 per cent.

The amount was not small. It constituted over 38,000,000 pounds in June, 1917, and a little over 6,000,000 pounds in June, 1916.

This is the most startling of the increases, but generally there is a large increase. For instance, cured beef, 59.7 per cent; all frozen and cured meats, 15.4 per cent. I have made up a statement, which I ask to be included in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

Cold-storage holdings.

Is it not strange that with the scarcity and high prices of food products these products, butter, cheese, eggs, poultry, and cured and frozen meats should be in storage in this country in such enormously increased quantities?

Mr. President, I am not making any argument against the producers, manufacturers, and merchants making a good profit. I believe, however, in times of extraordinary demand, in times of scarcity and rising prices there has been undue hoarding and speculation. If we are to believe all the testimony we have and the statement of the department, that must be true. If it is not so, this bill will not harm them. If there is no undue speculation and undue hoarding of these necessaries of life, then the power vested here can not injure them. I certainly do not wish the Government to lay its hands upon the enterprising American citizen, upon any legitimate business, whether it is the packers, the manufacturers, the railroad men, or the farmers. I do not believe that the Government should do that except in a case of necessity at a time of unusual demand, when the Government is requiring all the resources and power of the Nation to meet this great struggle. I do not believe that the Government should take over all the business of the country——

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. Is it not possible that the evil of which the Senator has spoken will be remedied by giving the President of the United States authority to fix the storage charges in the first place. Then in section 8 of the bill we give him authority to go in the open market and buy at not less than the price fixed, if the price has been fixed, but to sell at any prices he sees fit. Would not that of itself be the means to bring down the high prices of which the Senator has spoken?

Mr. KELLOGG. I think so. I suppose that was the object of the bill and I believe it should be enacted into law. I believe the Government must exercise great care when it fixes charges for this business, and it should only exercise the power in a great exigency when it is necessary to protect the Nation.

These statements show that speculators have been taking advantage of the necessities of the people and have been unduly hoarding and obtaining exorbitant profits. Undoubtedly, also, in the purchase of grain, coal, iron, steel, and other products advantage has been taken of the fact that there was a scarcity. It has been stated before that on the Chicago Board of Trade whenever a foreign country would make a bid for wheat, their intention to buy was disclosed or information was given out in some manner and speculators got word of the intended purchase and made enormous purchases for speculative purposes.

These statements do not come from the agitators. They come from the organized purchasers of grain for milling in this country. They state that the legitimate milling business of this country has been hampered by undue speculation or purchases following the Government purchases on the boards of trade, and the large milling interest and the small milling interests and the people generally have suffered by it.

For this reason I believe it is necessary that the Government should control the purchase for foreign countries during the war. I do not believe it should be a permanent policy. I believe we should in times of peace encourage the open market and the widest world commerce, and enable our people to reap the greatest profit they can in competition with other nations; that we should not place burdens and restrictions upon our people which foreign nations do not place upon their people.

Our foreign commerce affords the greatest single market for our products, and its maintenance is of the most vital interest to the farmers, producers, and manufacturers. When this war closes we are going to meet a competition in foreign trade by the nations of Europe, which will be forced to manufacture, produce, and sell at any cost to support their people and to pay the interest upon their enormous debts. I do not wish to see placed upon the farmers, manufacturers, or the exporters of this country any burdens or any restrictions that are unreasonable and which will in the slightest degree incapacitate them from meeting this great world competition. We are a surplus-producing people, and we must keep open for our people the markets of the world, but this war has shaken the foundation of the commercial world and the economic law of supply and demand and competition. It has caused an abnormal demand upon our resources to support the allied nations, their armies and navies, and our own likewise. It has become necessary that our markets and the markets of the world be controlled for the prosecution of the war. It is only for that reason that I would vote to give this Government such unparalleled power.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Will the Senator yield to me for a suggestion just at that point?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I find in the bill a provision prohibiting the manufacture of beer and whisky, but there is no provision prohibiting the importation of beer and whisky into this country. Does not the Senator think the bill should contain something of that character, to prohibit the importation of beer from Canada, or other countries? With the Senator's permission, I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to that evident omission. I think to make the bill perfect in all its details it ought to be looked over, and the committee ought to provide an amendment covering that point. If we are to prohibit the American people from engaging in this nefarious traffic, the people of other countries should not be permitted to bring the product here.

Mr. KELLOGG. I do not wish to take the time of the Senate to-night to discuss the prohibition features. I imagine, however, that they will be fully discussed before the bill is passed. Of course it is a pertinent suggestion to say that barley may be shipped to Canada and to England and manufactured into beer and the beer shipped back here, but if the Senator will pardon me I will not digress to discuss that provision.

But the farmer has not received these abnormal profits, and the greatest field for this food commission, so called, if its activities are principally to be directed to food products, is to see that the farmer's prices are not unduly depressed; that the market facilities are improved; and the speculator and middleman are not permitted to take all the profits. Reasonable profits in all lines of industry are necessary to the maintenance of production, manufacture, trade, and commerce.

And it is especially necessary, as was said by the Senator from Massachusetts, in view of the fact that we must raise enormous sums in this country from the productivity of the country.

Mr. President, I view with much apprehension the change of our entire industrial policy and this excursion by the Government into fields of commerce and trade. Our activities should be principally to encourage production, prevent undue speculation and hoarding, limit the charges of the middleman to reasonable profits, and to regulate the facilities for storage and marketing. Ordinarily, the great principles of supply and demand, stronger than the laws of Congress, will take care of prices and production, and the province of the Government is to regulate, prevent abuse of power, encourage industry and thrift, and keep open the avenues of enterprise. But in this remarkable period of world history, when the social and economic foundations of nations are shaking, the natural laws of trade and commerce have become ineffectual, and I believe the Government must temporarily take into its hands the control of its material resources.

I hope and believe that that power will be wisely exercised, and, as I have said before, if it is not, we must rely on the great tribunal of public opinion. Let us not, however, as imperial Rome did, crush agriculture to distribute free grain to the cities.

Mr. SWANSON. I ask the Senator from Oregon whether he expects to go on further with the bill to-night?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will ask the Chair if the House bill has been made the unfinished business?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill was temporarily laid aside, that is all.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move that the House bill be made the unfinished business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon moves that the Senate proceed with the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4961) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SWANSON. I ask the Senator from Oregon if he will agree to lay it temporarily aside that I may call up a bill from the calendar?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will ask that the bill be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be temporarily laid aside.

ARMOR S. HEFFLEY.

Mr. SWANSON. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 2482) to reinstate Armor S. Heffley as a second lieutenant in the United States Marine Corps.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to reinstate Armor S. Heffley as a second lieutenant in the United States Marine Corps, as an additional number.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representative, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House insists upon its amendment to the bill (S. 1816) to amend the act to regulate commerce, as amended, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the Senate, agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. ADAMSON, Mr. SIMS, and Mr. ESCH managers of the conference on the part of the House.

CONTRACTS FOR WAR MATERIALS (S. DOC. NO. 55).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following communication from the President of the United States, which was read:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, June 27, 1917.

MY DEAR MR. VICE PRESIDENT: I transmit herewith a letter from the Secretary of the Navy recommending the enactment of a joint resolution authorizing the advance of public moneys under contracts for war materials.

The recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy has my hearty approval.

Very respectfully, WOODROW WILSON.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair believes that the message and accompanying letter ought to go to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Is it not a letter from the Secretary of the Navy?

The VICE PRESIDENT. This is the nature of it: The difficulty is in getting sufficient war material without making an advance payment. The law now prohibits an advance payment, the Government to pay for nothing until the material has been delivered. This is asking for an amendment to the law so that under a bond safely protecting the Government against the advance payment, payment may be made of 30 per cent of the contract. The Chair will refer it to the Committee on Appropriations. That will cover all committees.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I rose because I thought the Chair had referred it to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thought it had to do with another matter until he looked at the accompanying letter.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, June 29, 1917, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, June 28, 1917.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou great Father-Soul, to whom we are indebted for life and its attendant blessings, our hearts go out in gratitude to Thee for the inherent qualities of mind and soul out of which the many philanthropic organizations have sprung, the object of which is to educate the ignorant, heal the broken hearted, lift up the fallen, and alleviate suffering. Especially do we thank Thee for the great international organization under the banner of the Red Cross which has proved its efficiency in the past and which is doing its work of mercy now in this time of war; for the great preparation it is now making to do the needed work for mankind and especially our soldiers who have been called to the colors. Great is its work and great are its needs. Grant that our people may continue to respond to its call; that it may do its work faithfully, efficiently in this time of stress. Through Him who taught us mercy and love. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed Senate bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 1854. An act to save daylight and to provide standard time for the United States.

RELIEF FROM ASSESSMENT WORK ON ACCOUNT OF MILITARY SERVICE.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate joint resolution 33 and consider it.

Mr. MADDEN. What is it?

Mr. FOSTER. It is a resolution to relieve——

Mr. STAFFORD. Let us have it reported.

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. Is a similar resolution or anything of the sort——

Mr. FOSTER. No; there is not.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Senate joint resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 33) to relieve the owners of mining claims who have been mustered into the military or naval service of the United States as officers or enlisted men from performing assessment work during the term of such service.

Resolved, etc., That the provisions of section 2324 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which require that on each mining claim located after the 10th day of May, 1872, and until patent has been issued therefor, not less than $100 worth of labor shall be performed or improvements made during each year, shall not apply to claims or parts of claims owned by officers or enlisted men who have been mustered into the military or naval service of the United States, so that no mining claim or any part thereof owned by such person which has been regularly located and recorded shall be subject to forfeiture for nonperformance of the annual assessments until six months after such owner is mustered out of the service or until six months after his death in the service: Provided, That the claimant of any mining location, in order to obtain the benefits of this resolution, shall file, or cause to be filed, in the office where the location notice or certificate is recorded, within 90 days from and after the passage and approval of this resolution, a notice of his muster into the service of the United States and of his desire to hold said mining claim under this resolution.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not know whether this bill is actually in the form in which it was at the time I read it some days ago; but when I read it I thought, from a somewhat hurried reading—and that impression is strengthened by the reading at the desk—that an amendment should be made. Would the gentleman have any objection to having this go over for a short time?

Mr. FOSTER. Well, I will ask the gentleman this: Does the gentleman refer to the proviso?

Mr. MONDELL. No. My objection, if it is well founded, refers to the question as to whether it protects the locator against contest that might be filed after the service, for failure to comply with the law during the service. I think a delay of a few hours would make no particular difference; and if the gentleman does not object——

Mr. HAYDEN. If the gentleman from Illinois will permit, I will say to the gentleman from Wyoming that this bill is identical with the act which I introduced in the last Congress and which we passed through the House on the 19th of last February with his able assistance, but which failed to receive consideration in the Senate. The Senate has now passed my bill with some slight changes. The only difference between the two is that the act we passed last February referred to the National Guard, or Organized Militia, at that time on duty on the Mexican border and this act says "military service of the United States," so that it now extends to men of the Army and Navy, the Marine Corps, the National Guard, or anybody else now in the service.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield? Congress during the Spanish-American War passed a similar act, July 2, 1898, which contained a further provision in section 3 which did not throw the protecting arm of this bill to instances where the claim was owned by others in common with the owner who enlisted, as to those other part owners.

Mr. HAYDEN. I submitted the original act of 1898 to the officials of the Interior Department, and they drafted the bill which I introduced in the last Congress. This bill is in the same form in which it passed the House last February.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to inquire, where there is a claim owned in common with others, one of whom enters the service of the United States and these others fail to perform, whether they would have their rights as well intact under this law?

Mr. HAYDEN. The law is intended to protect the owner of a mining claim who enlists in the military service of the United States, and nobody else.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is not answering the question I propounded to him. Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Mines and Mining, and also the attention of the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] to the language of the act that I refer to:

SEC. 3. That if any such enlisted soldier or sailor as a coowner or coowners in any mining claim, and who are not in the Army or Navy, and such coowner or coowners fail to do such a proportion of $100 worth of work per annum as the interest of such nonenlisted person or persons bears to the whole claim, then such interest shall be open to relocation by any other qualified person or persons by their doing the necessary work thereon and filing an affidavit of labor showing the forfeiture and that the relocators had done the annual work required of such nonenlisted persons and succeeded them in right under this act, which work may be done at any time after the expiration of the assessment year and before the former owners resume work thereon. The work and affidavit aforesaid shall operate as a transfer of said forfeited interest from the former owners to said relocators.

Now, I wish to direct this inquiry, whether with the passage of this bill in its present form we would take away from other parties the right of relocating, so far as the rights of coowners are concerned, who have failed to perform their $100 worth of work during the year? Of course, there is no objection whatever to exempting those who enlist from the performance of their $100 worth of work under the mining claim.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think it affects the coowners at all. This only affects the interest of the miner who enlists and can not affect those who have not enlisted and own a portion of that mine.

Mr. HAYDEN. That was the interpretation that the Department of the Interior placed upon that law when I took it up with them. They said that such legislation was unnecessary, and therefore it is left out of this draft of the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. If they fail to perform their required quota of work, they lose their rights?

Mr. HAYDEN. Exactly so. This applies to soldiers or sailors, and nobody else.

Mr. FRENCH. Is it not true that the committee is considering a bill that will even provide for the exemption of all those who have located mining claims during the period of the war? It seems to me that it is a very desirable thing at this time.

Mr. FOSTER. The committee has under consideration now a bill to relieve all those who have located mining claims from doing the assessment work during the war. But the bill has not yet been reported. We have not yet had an answer from the department in reference to it, and so we wanted to get this bill through in order that these boys who enlist in the Army or Navy or Marine Corps may be relieved and know where they stand with reference to their mining claims.

Mr. FRENCH. The gentleman has answered practically the query that I made. It seems to me that it is important that this bill pass now, but that also we should follow up this legislation with legislation that will excuse all who have these mining entries, because the condition of the farms, the demand for labor on the farms and in the orchards, and so on, is so great that it occurs to me that the man who has an interest in a mining claim can very much more profitably be employed on a farm, or in a mill, or in an orchard, than he can be employed by requiring him to do his assessment work during the period of this war. And I think we should press for consideration the bill that the chairman of the committee has just referred to, a little later on, but that this one should pass now.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would like to inquire of the gentleman whether under the language of the resolution, in case a soldier has enlisted it would exempt his claim from forfeiture provided he had not performed the work in prior years and is in default for many years.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, no.

Mr. STAFFORD. It does not say so.

Mr. HAYDEN. We can not pass an ex-post facto law.

Mr. STAFFORD. I beg the gentleman's pardon. We can adopt any condition whatever on the right of the claimant to perform all the conditions of entry or waive any such conditions.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I still think that the objection I have to the legislation is well based, and I would like to talk to the chairman of the committee as to the matter. So I shall have to object for the present. We can take the bill up later.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming objects.

RELIEF OF HOMESTEAD ENTRYMEN IN MILITARY AND NAVAL SERVICE.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I call up and ask unanimous consent for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4991, there being a similar Senate bill on the calendar.

The SPEAKER. A similar House bill or a similar Senate bill?

Mr. FERRIS. A similar Senate bill. I ask unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 4991, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4991) providing for the counting of military service in the Army and Navy of the United States as equivalent to residence and cultivation upon homestead entries, and in the event of the soldier's death in such service, providing for the issuance of patent for such land to his widow or minor children.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask if it was reported unanimously by the committee?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes; and it was passed by the Senate two or three weeks ago.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate bill.

Mr. FERRIS. The number of the bill is S. 1811, and it is on the Speaker's table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to file a petition sent to me on the subject of prohibition.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a right to file it without asking any leave to do so.

RELIEF BECAUSE OF MILITARY SERVICE.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 1811) providing for the counting of service in the Army or Navy of the United States as equivalent to residence and cultivation upon homestead entries, and in the event of the soldier's death in such service providing for the issuance of patent for such land to his widow or minor children.

Be it enacted, etc. That in every case in which a settler on the public land of the United States under the homestead laws enlists or is actually engaged in the military or naval service of the United States as a private soldier, officer, seaman, marine, National Guardsman, or member of any other organization for offense or defense authorized by Congress during the existing war with Germany, or during any other war in which the United States may be engaged, his services therein shall, in the administration of the homestead laws, be construed to be equivalent to all intents and purposes to residence and cultivation for the same length of time upon the tract entered or settled upon; and hereafter no contest shall be initiated on the ground of abandonment, nor allegation of abandonment sustained against any such settler, unless it shall be alleged in the preliminary affidavit or affidavits of contest and proved at the hearing in cases hereafter initiated that the settler's alleged absence from the land was not due to his employment in such service; that if such settler shall be discharged on account of wounds received or disability incurred in the line of duty, then the term of his enlistment shall be deducted from the required length of residence without reference to the time of actual service.

SEC. 2. That in every case in which a settler on the public lands of the United States under the homestend laws dies while actually engaged in the military or naval service of the United States as private soldier, officer, seaman, marine, National Guardsman, or member of any other organization for offense or defense authorized by Congress during the existing war with Germany, or during any other war in which the United States may be engaged, his widow, if unmarried, or in case of her death or marriage, then his minor orphan children, or his or their legal representatives, may proceed forthwith to make final proof upon the land so entered and held by the deceased soldier and settler, and shall be entitled to receive Government patent for such land; and that the death of such soldier while so engaged in the service of the United States shall, in the administration of the homestead laws, be construed to be equivalent to a performance of all requirements as to residence and cultivation upon such homestead.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. NORTON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman explain the change this bill makes in the existing law?

Mr. FERRIS. The only far-reaching change that it makes is that it includes National Guardsmen, and it gives the same relief to the man now serving his country in time of war as it has given in the case of prior wars and as was given prior to the enactment of the recent National Guard bill. Under the old law the National Guardsmen were not entitled to this relief, but now that they are covered into the regular service and rendering the same service as the Regulars, they are entitled to the same relief on their homesteads as the Regular soldiers would receive.

Mr. NORTON. Those serving in the National Guard engaged with the United States Army are allowed time in homesteading?

Mr. FERRIS. That is true.

Mr. NORTON. Does this act permit one who is in that service to be allowed time for the time spent in the service?

Mr. FERRIS. It allows everyone serving in the war to be given credit on his homestead for the time he is serving his country and his flag.

Mr. NORTON. Does it permit him to make entry on that account?

Mr. FERRIS. No; it does not give him the right of entry, and none of the other prior war-time relief acts have granted him that right.

Mr. NORTON. In other words, he must have been an entryman before he enters the service?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. Did the law of 1898 refer to volunteer soldiers?

Mr. FERRIS. It referred to every class of soldiers except National Guardsmen.

Mr. LITTLE. Did it use the word "volunteer"?

Mr. FERRIS. I have not before me the act, but I think it included all but National Guardsmen—all men in the Regular Army service.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. I notice, in comparing the House bill with the Senate bill, and in comparing both bills with the existing statute, that in the Senate bill there is a proviso which has been left out in the Senate bill, namely, the language covered in lines 17 to 19 of the House bill, which provide that "no patent shall issue to any homestead settler who has not resided upon, improved, and cultivated his homestead for a period of at least one year."

Mr. FERRIS. That is true. We did not want to give a homestead—and the law has never provided for that—to the man who has not lived on it at all.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understand the gentleman favors that proposition?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is not included in the Senate bill.

Mr. FERRIS. The Senate bill passed and came over here without any report from the department at all concerning it. We took no action on it in that form. It was held on the Speaker's table. We sent it down immediately to the department and got a report on it. They objected to the bill unless that provision was in, so that we incorporated in the bill the provision insisted upon by the department, and it is now in the bill, and I am going to ask to strike out all after the enacting clause of the Senate bill and put in our bill, which has had a favorable report from the committee, and a favorable report from the Interior Department and from everybody who has had anything to do with it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I notice, too, that it differs in this particular, that in case of the death of the claimant soldier you extend such rights to his heirs in addition to his legal representatives.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Oklahoma will permit, that provision is in the law now. That is the general law now.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why should we extend this privilege to outsiders, you might say, distant relatives, who may not have a real direct interest? Everyone is willing to confer this right upon the soldier and his widow, and if there is no widow or she marries again, then to his minor children. But why give it to the collateral heirs who might have no claim on the bounty or gratuity of the Government?

Mr. FERRIS. I thought that in the case where a homesteader had gone a long way toward earning his homestead and had put up his buildings and his house and had almost earned his homestead, it might as well pass to his heirs. But I will say to the gentleman that I am not keen about that.

Mr. MONDELL. Let me make this suggestion——

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. This is a matter of protecting the soldier's property rights, and if the soldier loses his life the Government should not object to protecting his property rights in the homestead.

Mr. STAFFORD. You would confer that right upon the widow and then upon the minor children?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think that would be adequate protection, without extending it to some distant relative or to his cousins or his aunts, or even to his forty-second cousins.

Mr. MONDELL. The soldier may have obligations. Most of these entrymen have obligations. You should not take from him perhaps the only piece of property he has with which those obligations might be met.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is considering the creditors. I am considering only the entryman and his immediate relatives. I do not think the bounty of the Government should be conferred on distant relatives.

Mr. FERRIS. If that does not meet with the approval of the gentleman from Wisconsin, of course we will have to meet his objection. But suppose a homesteader had resided on his claim for 2 years and had served in the Army, say, 10 months, and only 2 months remained until he got title to his homestead. Now, suppose he is a single man—and a good many of them are single men who will serve in this war. If it was taken from him, it would not be a proposition of saving something to the Government, but it would be a proposition of some other homesteader acquiring the other man's improvements—his house and his peach trees and his flowers—without having made the effort to produce them himself. I fear it might allow claim jumpers to avail themselves of the work and achievement of a man who fell in defense of his country.

Mr. STAFFORD. Even granting that point, does not the gentleman think that ought to go to his immediate relatives and not to some distant and collateral heirs? I object to the word "heirs." We would have a multiplicity of contests to determine who those heirs are. Let it accrue to his immediate relatives, if he has any.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. RAKER. The word "heirs," on line 4, page 3, was inserted by the committee, and I think by mistake. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to this, that the way that language now reads, and the way it reads in the bill without amendment is the way it reads in the law now, and it ought not to be changed.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then, the gentleman approves my position?

Mr. RAKER. I think the gentleman's position is absolutely correct.

Mr. LENROOT. If I may suggest to the gentleman, if the word "heirs" is stricken out, it will still leave the law existing so that the heirs may go on and have credit for the time that the entryman has occupied.

Mr. FERRIS. That is very true.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. If the gentleman will allow me to suggest, when these National Guardsmen are finally taken into the Federal service they will then come under the provisions of the law, so far as their homestead rights are concerned.

Mr. FERRIS. They would when finally covered in, but we have three armies now—the national army, which is the conscript army, the National Guardsmen, and then the Regulars. Some of these organizations may or may not be covered in; but whether they are or not, they are held in training camps, and to do coast duty and home-guard duty, so that they are prevented from either residing on their claims or doing the required work on them.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I agree with the gentleman entirely on that. The National Guardsmen are being summoned to their respective residences, recruits are constantly being secured, the public are urging men to go into the National Guard, and we ought to protect their rights, even though they are not technically in the Federal service. From the time they enlist in the National Guard their rights ought to be protected.

Mr. FERRIS. I think that is undoubtedly true, and I am glad the proposition meets with the gentleman's approval.

Mr. MONDELL. Now, if the gentleman will allow, I think the word "or," in line 5, page 1 of the House bill, should be stricken out and the word "and" inserted, or, if that is not done, the words "actually engaged" should be stricken out, in order to prevent the possibility of entries being made by men after they have enlisted.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, we can not hear this private conversation which is going on over there.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the House is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is sustained, and gentlemen will please speak so they can be heard.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, it seems to me there is only one possible objection to the legislation, and that is that it might be used as a vehicle for making homestead entries after men were in the service, with the view to securing the benefits of the act. No one wants that done.

Mr. FERRIS. No.

Mr. MONDELL. That would be entirely cured and the act not changed at all if the words "or is actually engaged" were stricken out, or if the word "or," in line 5, page 1, were stricken out and the word "and" substituted.

Mr. FERRIS. We are glad to accept that amendment.

Mr. LITTLE. Do you mean to penalize a man who goes into the Army and take away a right that he now has?

Mr. MONDELL. Not at all, but a man who was actually in the service could not make an entry or go upon the land, and under this law the effort might be made, and I think would be made, to encourage men, after they had entered the service, to attempt to make entries with a view to securing the benefits of this act.

Mr. LITTLE. I hope so. I hope that effort will be made.

Mr. MONDELL. I think it would be very unfortunate indeed if it should be.

Mr. LITTLE. I hope the chairman of the committee will not accede to any amendment which will take away a man's rights after he has entered the Army.

Mr. FERRIS. He has not that right now.

Mr. LITTLE. He has a right to make an entry, and the gentleman's amendment deprives him of the right as soon as he enters the Army.

Mr. CALDWELL. An hour before he goes in he can make his entry, but not after he gets in.

Mr. LITTLE. I hope he will be allowed to make his entry after he gets in. I am opposed to penalizing men who go to fight for their country.

Mr. BLAND. He will have all the rights he ever had.

Mr. LITTLE. Not if this amendment is adopted.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman from Oklahoma state the proposal of the gentleman from Wyoming that he thought should be adopted?

Mr. FERRIS. On page 1, line 5, the gentleman from Wyoming suggests that we strike out the word "or" and insert the word "and."

Mr. STAFFORD. Page 1, line 5, of the House bill?

Mr. FERRIS. Of the House bill. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE] was of the opinion that that might penalize men in the service. Of course, as a matter of fact, a man in the service now can not make a homestead entry, and I do not think this is very important. As far as I am concerned I am perfectly willing to accept the amendment; but the House can vote on it. The gentleman from Wyoming can offer it.

Mr. LITTLE. Do I understand the gentleman to say that a man in the Army can not now make a homestead entry?

Mr. FERRIS. A man in the service can not now make an entry.

Mr. LITTLE. If he can not, then this does not apply.

Mr. LENROOT. What law now prevents a man in actual service from making a homestead entry?

Mr. FERRIS. He can not make it because he can not establish his residence.

Mr. LENROOT. But residence is not required previous to entry, is it?

Mr. FERRIS. No.

Mr. LENROOT. Therefore he can make his entry.

Mr. FERRIS. But he has got to establish his residence on the land, so that entering the service makes him incapable of perfecting his entry.

Mr. LENROOT. Of course, you gentlemen from the West do not want to have a situation where all your public lands could be taken up by men in the Army without any cultivation. I am a little afraid——

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, the private conversation which is going on over there does not assist the House any in the consideration of this bill, because we can not hear it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has tried his best to make it public several times.

Mr. FERRIS. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will let us have an opportunity to answer any question in which he is interested.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, as far as I can see, there is no provision in this bill for a woman who may have a homestead entry, and who may enlist in the Red Cross and go into the war.

Mr. FERRIS. She is as much an entryman as a man, and so, of course, would be included.

Mr. NORTON. There is another section of this bill which provides that in the case of the death of the entryman his widow shall inherit his rights under the entry; but throughout the bill there is no provision to cover the case of a woman who has a homestead entry.

Mr. FERRIS. I will say that I think the word "entryman" is ample to take it in, and if not, I will accept an amendment.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman made this statement which is not correct, that a man who is now enlisted in the United States Army does not have a right to make an entry. A man may go before his commanding officer and make the necessary affidavits for a homestead entry at the present time under existing law. He would not, of course, be able to comply with the homestead requirement of residence.

Mr. LITTLE. Yes; he could; his term of service might expire. I think the gentleman from North Dakota is wrong, a man's term of service might expire the next day.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The regular order!

The SPEAKER. The regular order is, Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FERRIS. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to consider the bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

Mr. OSBORNE. Reserving the right to object, I want to say in regard to this matter of an enlisted man making an entry, suppose the enlisted man has a wife and half a dozen children. He thinks it desirable while he is in the war to have a home and a place where that wife and children may remain while he is in the service. The contemplated amendment would prevent him from exercising the right which another man might exercise of making a home on the public domain.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to considering the bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Oklahoma spoke about substituting the Senate bill for the House bill.

Mr. FERRIS. Yes, Mr. Speaker; I ask unanimous consent to strike out all after the enacting clause in the Senate bill and insert the House bill.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman has not yet got consent to consider the Senate bill in lieu of the House bill.

Mr. FERRIS. I ask unanimous consent to consider the Senate bill in lieu of the House bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FERRIS. Now, I ask unanimous consent to strike out all after the enacting clause in the Senate bill and insert the House bill, H. R. 4991.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman from Wisconsin has an amendment that he wishes to offer.

Mr. RAKER. There is a committee amendment in the bill.

Mr. FERRIS. I ask for a vote on the committee amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 4, after the word "States," insert the words "or entrymen."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, before voting on that I want to call attention of the gentleman to the fact that the word "entrymen" ought to be "entryman."

Mr. FERRIS. Very well.

Mr. CRAMTON. I move that as an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves to amend the amendment by making the word "entrymen" "entryman."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 4, after the word "his," insert the word "heirs."

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, this amendment is the one which the gentleman from Wisconsin is interested in, and I agree with him that the amendment ought to go out, and I hope it will be voted down.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the committee amendment was rejected.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to amend the bill, and I think all the members of the committee are in harmony with it, so that the provisions of the bill will not apply to entrymen who make an entry after enlistment. There are various amendments that might be made to accomplish that purpose, but it has been suggested that after the word "engaged," in line 5, page 1, we insert the words "after entry."

Mr. LENROOT. "After settlement or entry."

Mr. MONDELL. "After settlement or entry."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 5, after the word "engaged," insert the words "after settlement or entry."

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I want to consider that amendment. I do not believe it is fair as it now stands without a further amendment to the bill. There may be a number of cases where the man has made application and there has been no entry because it has not been accepted.

Mr. MONDELL. The settlement under this amendment would be safe.

Mr. RAKER. That is true; but there are cases where he does not now make a settlement.

Mr. MONDELL. He must have made a settlement or an entry.

Mr. RAKER. A man can file before he goes on the land. Suppose a man has made a filing and it has not been accepted, and he has not made a residence. I know that the gentleman does not want to defeat any man's right, and has no intention of it. There are many cases where the honest applicant would be defeated; amend the bill so as to provide for him.

Mr. LENROOT. Under the committee bill it is confined to a settlement or entry.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] will remember that in my district, as well as his, a great many young men have made application for the 640-acre homestead entry. The paper a few weeks ago recorded the fact that at least a hundred of these young men have volunteered, and they would be interfered with and their rights interfered with by an amendment of this kind.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming might correct the amendment. There are many applications in the Land Office now by young men all over the West who have joined the Army, or will be drafted, and their claims ought to be protected.

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that he is speaking about men who have made application and whose applications have not been accepted.

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. MORGAN. This bill opens it to the settler and entryman. In other words, if a man has made his application, he is then neither a settler nor an entryman.

Mr. RAKER. That is not the object of this bill.

Mr. MORGAN. Let me go a little further.

Mr. RAKER. He may be considered an entryman by having filed his application, but this bill says that it must be after his entry.

Mr. MORGAN. Why would it not better meet the gentleman's point to amend it by saying a person who has made settlement or applied to enter or made entry? Then you would include the man you want to and unless you make an amendment including the application the present bill would not meet the situation.

Mr. RAKER. If the gentleman will wait a moment, I think I can make it plain. This provides for the man who has made settlement and it provides for the man who has made his application.

Mr. MORGAN. No.

Mr. RAKER. Yes; it does. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] says that it can not be considered until this entry has actually been allowed.

Mr. MORGAN. The gentleman does not understand me. I am not supporting the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming. I am calling the gentleman's attention to this fact, that if he wants to include men who have merely made application he should insert here an amendment which would include men who have applied.

Mr. RAKER. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that in the committee the other day it appeared that there were some 54,000 applications now on file for public land and they can not be allowed until there has been an inspection. These men should be provided for. After consulting with the chairman, Mr. FERRIS, an amendment will be offered to correct this defect and provide for the men who have made applications, but whose applications have not been allowed because under the law an inspection or classification must first be had. These men must also be protected, and will be under the amendment to be offered later by Mr. FERRIS. I know this amendment will strike the right spot and provide proper relief for all who are entitled to relief.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. LITTLE rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Kansas rise?

Mr. LITTLE. For the purpose of saying a word about this amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, this amendment is made to make it impossible for a soldier fighting for his country to make an entry which every other man here can make and receive the credit of his time of actual service on the time he must live on the land, which soldiers will receive who make entries before enlisting. If you seek to prevent him from squandering his right you can make an amendment stating the terms on which and the limitations under which he can sell. That is the effect of it now. It is an effort to penalize a soldier more than to thwart the speculator. It may be that these soldiers will come home and remain in camps three or four months, and it may be that some large tracts of land will be opened to settlement just then, and during 3 months or 90 days they will be deprived of the privilege of making an entry on which they can be credited with their time in the Army, and by the time they were discharged it would all be seized. It is unjust. Every soldier who goes to Europe or who stays at home, if he is in the service, takes a chance and it would be a cruel thing to penalize him. It is no use to say that it does not penalize him, for that is the only purpose of it; and if it does not do that it has no business here. Men who risk their lives for this country should receive at least as much consideration as the rest of our citizens.

You gentlemen do not realize how little appreciation there is of these men. I hold in my hand here a paper which I received this morning. Here is an application blank prepared by the War Department which a young man must sign who desires to go into a training camp to secure a commission. It gives the qualifications that he has to have. He is allowed to enumerate the fact that he was in the Regular Army, that he was in the National Guard, or in some reserve officers' training corps or cadet corps; that he was in some foreign army; or that he had some miscellaneous qualification including civilian training camps; but there is no place in this application anywhere where a man who fought in Cuba as a volunteer, or a man who fought in the Philippines as a volunteer, can say to the War Department that he has had service and has risked his life for his country. The War Department does not want to be told that a man who has fought for his country as a volunteer has done so. They want Regulars, cadets, National Guardsmen, and civilians, but not veterans. A boy came to my office this morning who fought with our regiment in the Philippines and said, "Where can I tell them I fought with a volunteer regiment in 15 battles?" There is no place. They do not want that information. There is no consideration down there for the actual experience of a man who has fought in battle for his country as a volunteer. The men who are to issue commissions do not care to hear of men who saw active service in action in Cuba and the Philippines as volunteers. Why?

You are doing a similar thing here, you are saying to the men who go to fight, "We do not propose to allow you any consideration because of the fact that you fight; we propose to penalize you." The effect of this provision is that the man who joins the Army can not make the entry during the war like you and I can and get the benefit of his war time on his entry as other soldiers can, and it is an unjust provision. It is an attempt to penalize him, and this should not be done. The development of various parts of our country is desirable, but the welfare of several million young men who will return from the European campaigns is much more important. The average soldier has horse sense. There is no presumption that he will squander his birthright when he comes home to establish a family. There was no such provision against the men who saved the Union or fought with Washington. Give to the men who climb the ramparts of the Rhine every possible opportunity when they come home. The development of the West will stop during the war, like many more good projects. You can not carry it on by disciplining the after-war conduct of your soldiers.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE] is not the only friend of the American soldier, much as he may assume to be and when the gentleman says that the amendment proposed in any wise shortens the right of a soldier to make entry while he is in the service he says what is not so and what everyone who knows anything about the land laws knows is not so. The intent of the amendment is simply to prevent an entry after service, which would generally be by agent, securing the benefits of this particular act. There are not many men who will enter into the service of the United States who will have any desire after entering that service to use that service as a means of securing a tract of land under the homestead law without any requirement of residence and cultivation; but there are always in the western country a certain class of land sharks who are always looking for some one to make an easy entry not for the entryman's benefit but for their benefit, and in legislating for the honest entryman we should not legislate so as to encourage speculative entry for the benefit of others. They could go around the camps in the East and say to the boys, "Make me your agent to make a homestead entry, and if you remain long enough in the service you can get the land without the necessity of making settlement, improving, or residing upon it." Now, there is nothing in this amendment, nothing proposed in the amendment, that prevents a man from making a homestead entry when he is in the service; it simply provides that the entry made while a man is in the service shall not entitle him to the benefits of this act. We want to be exceedingly liberal with the man who having made a homestead application, settlement, or entry enters the service of his country, but we do not want to encourage the wholesale entry by agent of vast areas by men who are not in the West and do not intend to go West and make a home or aid in development.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to call it to the attention of the gentleman from Wyoming, if I may have his attention, that the amendment as offered, in the form in which it is presented, will not accomplish what he desires, but will permit just what the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE] is contending for. The bill before us reads, "An entryman who enlists or is actually engaged in the military or naval service." Now, the amendment proposes to insert after the words "actually engaged" the words "after such settlement or entry." The result will be that a soldier who never had, before he entered the service, made any attempt to acquire a homestead may, after he enters the service and after this bill becomes the law, and after he has been actually engaged in active service for a month, thereafter make an entry and thereafter he may be "actually engaged in the service" for another six months. He comes under the benefits of this act because the language specifies "who enlists and who is actually engaged in the service."

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. If the words "enlists or" were stricken out, it will meet the objection and serve a useful purpose, because as it is now it is in the alternative.

Mr. CRAMTON. I suggest the words "actually engaged" be stricken out.

Mr. LENROOT. If you make it "enlists," then you cut off the men taken under the selective draft from the benefits of the act.

Mr. CRAMTON. What I am trying to point out is, the words "actually engaged" covers a continuous performance which runs all through the man's period of military service, hence the amendment that is suggested only provides there must be such "actual engaging" after the entry. There may have been likewise continued "actual engaging," if I may use such an expression, before the entry. It should be limited to those whose service is entirely after the entry, and that is not what the amendment proposes.

Mr. LENROOT. Or who is engaged after such entry. Would that limit it?

Mr. CRAMTON. Well, he was likewise engaged before. I am simply calling the attention of the gentleman from Wyoming, without entering very greatly into the merits of the bill generally, that the adoption of his amendment as he offers it will leave possible all the evils that he and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] protest against and are seeking to prevent.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, may we have the amendment again reported?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the reporting of the amendment? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendment was again reported.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the Mondell amendment.

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from California rise?

Mr. OSBORNE. I desire to move to strike out the last word.

The SPEAKER. The last word of what?

Mr. OSBORNE. Of the amendment. Mr. Speaker, I have had some experience in public-land matters, as I served the Government for six years as receiver of a United States land office and am somewhat familiar with the land laws. I want to say to the gentleman from Wyoming that I am sure he does not intend to do any injustice to the men who are enlisting in the Army. But I suggest to him the possibility of his amendment doing that injustice. Every once in a while through the United States there are Indian lands or something of that kind thrown open—valuable lands—in the western country. I wish to ask the gentleman if he believes it would be right, when these lands are thrown open to entry, to permit everyone in the United States, every male citizen, except those who enlist in the Army, to have a chance to enter those lands?

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OSBORNE. Surely.

Mr. MONDELL. Of course the amendment would in nowise affect their rights to make an entry. That has been reiterated and restated many times. It does not affect the enlisted man's rights to make an entry at all. It simply provides that his entry made after enlistment shall not have the benefit of this provision. In other words, that a man while he is in the Army can not then take a homestead, do nothing on it, and hence secure the benefits of his service in counting as time of residence.

Mr. OSBORNE. I understand the point of the gentleman, and I would say this in answer: That unless the soldier has the freedom to make his entry and the privilege accorded by this law he can not take any advantage of that freedom. He absolutely would be barred out exactly as though he could not make an entry at all, because he could not fulfill the conditions of settlement required by the homestead laws.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, unless the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Wyoming is adopted we will have this situation: Assuming we have 1,500,000 men finally engaged in this war, unless this amendment is adopted all of those 1,500,000 men who have not theretofore exercised their homestead rights may file upon any land open to entry without going upon it, without cultivating an acre of it, and the result would be that all the vacant land in the West now open to entry would be taken, it is fair to say, by these soldiers without securing a foot of cultivation or a single home until after the war is over.

It would absolutely shut out all of the public lands of the West if this amendment is adopted. Now, I do think there is some force in the objection made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON]. I think there should be another amendment adopted striking out the words "or enlist," and leave the act to apply to anybody who had, prior to engaging in the military service, made entry, and his entry afterwards allowed, or had settled upon these public lands, and give him the benefit of the act.

Mr. LITTLE. Can you think of any better way of disposing of the public land that remains than by giving it to the men who go to Europe to fight for their country?

Mr. LENROOT. I think the disposition of the land, especially in time of war, should be with a view of putting those lands in cultivation as far as possible, and the only thing we ought to do by this act is not to cut off the right of a man who has either made settlement entry or application for entry, and thus cut off a right that he already had.

Mr. RAKER. If the amendment of the gentleman from Wyoming should be adopted to provide for the case referred to as to the application, the gentleman from Oklahoma has an amendment that would cure the whole thing.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I hope the House will agree to the Mondell amendment. And then I have two amendments to offer.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. NORTON. May we have it reported?

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas is a little late, but still he demands a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 68, noes 6.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. FERRIS offers an amendment: Page 1, line 4, after the word "entryman," insert the words "or one who has made application therefor, which may thereafter be allowed."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Oklahoma rise?

Mr. MORGAN. To oppose that amendment.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman does not want to oppose that. It takes care of the 640-acre homestead fellows. You do not want to oppose that.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, in the main I approve this amendment, which is in line with the suggestion I made to my friend from California. I had an amendment prepared almost like it, except I think it should be amended by striking out the last clause, in which you say, "which may thereafter be allowed." Of course if it is not allowed it can never have any force and effect.

Mr. FERRIS. Let me suggest to the gentleman something that evidently is not in his mind. We passed in the last Congress, which was signed on December 31, 1916, a bill authorizing the entry of 640 acres of land where it is grazing land, and as a condition precedent to the allowance of the entry that the land must be examined before the entry is allowed. Over 60,000 applications have been made by soldiers and others, and none of those has as yet been examined. It would not be right to take the land away from a man who had applied for entry and had done his part to get an entry, because he was sent away to war to serve his country. This simply protects him until his application can be examined and allowed.

Mr. MORGAN. The gentleman does not quite catch my point. I am thoroughly in sympathy with that part of his amendment. As I said, I had one prepared. I think the last part of your amendment is entirely useless, because if the application is never allowed, of course it never has any force and effect, and the man could not have any right.

Mr. FERRIS. Oh, yes; it does. Under the law the application segregates the land, but it does not become an entry—a real entry—until it is examined and approved. Without this amendment it would not take in any of those. That would be a clear injustice which the Congress would not desire to inflict.

Mr. MORGAN. I am talking about the latter part of your amendment. The application never amounts to anything and a man could not get a right under an application that is not finally allowed.

Mr. FERRIS. The application is in there, and the entry——

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. He would be cut out unless this were in the amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. The gentleman does not understand. I said the main part of my amendment is exactly in line with the suggestion I made to the gentleman from California, that we ought to include those applications which have been made and are pending. That is perfectly right, because if a man's application is pending and the entry is not allowed through no fault of his, then he ought to have the same rights under it as if the entry was really of record. But in the latter part of your amendment you say that this shall be allowed providing the entry is finally allowed. That is surplusage, because if it is not allowed a man would never have any right.

Mr. FERRIS. I know that the gentleman from Oklahoma has long been an able lawyer——

Mr. MORGAN. After that compliment I will withdraw my objection. [Applause.]

Mr. FERRIS. And I know the gentleman is familiar with the land laws, but I am sure he misinterprets the language of the bill. I also fear he may not have in his mind all of the provisions in the 640-acre homestead bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FERRIS. I offer an amendment to the second section.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FERRIS: Page 2, line 21, after the word "States," insert "or entryman whose application has been allowed."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill as amended.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to section 2, page 2, line 20, after the word "settler," to insert the words "or entryman."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Dakota.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 20, after the word "settler," insert the words "or entryman."

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer this amendment in order to conform with the form of the bill in section 1.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NORTON. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. I do not believe the gentleman heard my second amendment.

Mr. NORTON. I did hear it.

Mr. FERRIS. It includes all entrymen whose applications have been allowed.

Mr. NORTON. I thought the amendment said "may hereafter be allowed."

Mr. FERRIS. No; it says "whose application has been allowed."

Mr. NORTON. Then I withdraw my amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Dakota withdraws his amendment.

Mr. NORTON. I move to strike out the last word.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Dakota moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the Members of the House that this bill has been very poorly drawn. There are very many inconsistencies and omissions in the bill. I take the same position that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] took, that with the Mondell amendment adopted, as it has been adopted, it gives an enlisted man in the Army the right to make entry, and then after he has made entry and has served for some little time longer he secures the benefits of the exemptions of this bill. The Mondell amendment if finally left in the bill, which I am sure it will not be, would open up a great big field for fraud.

There is no man in this House who is more a friend of the real bona fide homesteader than I am, but I do not want to see any legislation passed in this House that will permit hungry land agents throughout the country to solicit enlisted men in the Army to file upon land which they have never seen—to solicit men who, prior to their going into the Army, had no thought of making a homestead entry. This is not a wise way to have the public lands of the United States appropriated.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NORTON. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Of course, the gentleman realizes that before the amendment I offered was adopted the bill was clearly subject to the criticism which the gentleman makes.

Mr. NORTON. The gentleman's amendment, in order to have accomplished what he intended it to accomplish, should have been inserted after the word "laws," in line 3, instead of after the word "engaged," in line 2.

Mr. MONDELL. Except for the amendment I have offered, the very unfortunate condition which the gentleman has referred to would occur.

Mr. NORTON. Without the gentleman's amendment there would have been a question as to the proper interpretation of the law. Now, with the gentleman's amendment it is clear that a man who has enlisted and then makes entry and then continues service in the Army or Navy during the war is entitled to the exemptions granted in this bill.

Further, in section 2 of this bill there is no provision that in case a young man has filed upon a homestead, enters the Army or Navy, and is killed in the service the land goes to his father or mother. It provides only here in section 2 that the land shall descend to his widow, if she is unmarried, or to his orphan children; and then in lines 6 and 7 we have this disconnected expression, "or by his widow, minor children, or other heirs, as the case may be." I ask the chairman of the committee if he knows what that refers to? May I have the attention of the gentleman from Oklahoma? What do these words in lines 6 and 7, page 3, modify or refer to—"or by his widow, minor children, or other heirs, as the case may be"? What does that language modify? What sense is there to it?

Mr. FERRIS. It does not modify anything at all. This is in accordance with the law passed in 1898 and all previous laws.

Mr. NORTON. I agree with the gentleman that it modifies nothing. What sense is there in having it in the section?

Mr. FERRIS. The language is, "upon the entry made by the soldier, sailor, or marine, or by his widow, or minor children, or other heirs."

Mr. NORTON. I refer to the phrase "or by his widow, or minor children, or other heirs, as the case may be." What does that modify?

Mr. FERRIS. That is merely the existing law.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from North Dakota has expired.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out, in lines 6 and 7, page 3, the words "or by his widow, minor children, or other heirs."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Dakota withdraws his pro forma amendment, and offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "marine," in line 6, page 3, strike out the words "or by his widow, minor children, or other heirs."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to hear from the chairman of the committee, if he wants to speak first.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, this amendment ought to be voted down. This is in the old law, and it does nothing more than carry to the widow and minor heirs of the soldier the right they had under the old law. It has been passed upon heretofore, and there has been no trouble about it. We have included the National Guard, because under the law they are covered into the regular service and have been and are being sent across the sea, and it is necessary to include them.

This proposition has been gone over and submitted to the various branches of the Interior Department and compared with the law as it was before, and there is nothing wrong with it. If this bill carried $100,000,000, it would pass by unanimous consent, but inasmuch as it provides that a few men shall be given credit on their homesteads while they fight in defense of their flag, men see ghosts of all sorts, and land frauds, and things that have never been heard of.

We have already spent too much time on this bill to grant a little relief to a set of boys who have first filed on a homestead and tried to develop the West, and, second, have gone to the war to defend the Republic. The gentleman comes in here and offers an amendment which I do not believe he has had time to digest. He is not in agreement with the committee, or with the department, or with anybody else who has given any consideration to the subject, and he wants to cut out widows and orphans who now have the right to first make settlement and then make the proof. They deserve this right. They are entitled to it. I think every soldier's widow, after her husband has died a glorious death in the service of his country, ought to have this right made safe to them.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes; although the gentleman has had his five minutes.

Mr. NORTON. I did not have five minutes. I should like to have the gentleman tell me if he really knows anything about what the words that I have moved to strike out modify?

Mr. FERRIS. Section 2 authorizes the soldier's widow, children, and his representatives to make proof. The gentleman can understand as well as I do that if this is stricken out they can not.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman carefully read and analyze section 2 with me?

Section 2 reads as follows:

That in every case in which a settler on the public lands of the United States, under the homestead laws, dies while actually engaged in the military or naval service of the United States——

Mr. FERRIS. This section relates to proof.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman follow along with me as I read?

Mr. FERRIS. All right.

Mr. NORTON. It says:

SEC. 2. That in every case in which a settler on the public lands of the United States, under the homestead laws, dies while actually engaged in the military or naval service of the United States as private soldier, officer, seaman, marine, national guardsman, or member of any other organization for offense or defense authorized by Congress during the existing war with Germany, or during any other war in which the United States may be engaged, his widow, if unmarried, or in case of her death or marriage, then his minor orphan children, or his heirs, or their legal representatives, may proceed——

Mr. FERRIS. Yes; certainly.

Mr. NORTON. They may proceed—forthwith to make final proof upon the entry made by the soldier, sailor, or marine——

Mr. FERRIS. And that is as it should be.

Mr. NORTON. Certainly, that is all right. Then it says further, in lines 6 and 7—or by his widow, minor children, or other heirs.

Now, what in the world does that phrase modify?

Mr. FERRIS. They can make settlement, carry out the law, and then final proof. If the entryman is a husband with a wife and children and he loses his life in the war, it is only fair, decent, and square to let the widow or minor children make proof and acquire title to the land.

Mr. NORTON. You are talking beside the question. That is what is provided for in the first case. It says:

His widow, if unmarried, or in case of her death or marriage then his minor orphan children or his heirs or their legal representatives may proceed forthwith to make final proof.

Mr. FERRIS. Why not?

Mr. NORTON. That is all right, as I have before said, but why do you say again, in lines 6 and 7, on page 3?—

or by his widow, minor children, or other heirs.

Mr. FERRIS. Because we want them to have the opportunity to make the settlement and the proof. Both are necessary. Both must take place. One refers to settlement, one to proof.

Mr. NORTON. Oh, well, if the gentleman can not recognize that this phrase is wholly disconnected with the section it will be clear to others on the Public Land Committee before this bill is finally enacted into law.

Mr. STAFFORD. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. FERRIS. I move the previous question on this bill, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. STAFFORD. The Speaker has been granting recognition here.

Mr. FERRIS. I move the previous question.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman was in his seat when I rose, and he will not deny that.

Mr. FERRIS. I withdraw the demand, but I do not want to take up so much time.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think the clause to which the gentleman from North Dakota refers is mere tautology.

Mr. FERRIS. No; it is not, because one relates to the making of the entry and one relates to the proof, and both are necessary.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think the clause in lines 3, 4, and 5 relates to proof.

Mr. FERRIS. The first relates to proof and the last to settlement, and both are necessary in order that the entry may be perfected.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma moves the previous question on the bill and amendments to the final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the Norton amendment.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. NORTON) there were—ayes 14, noes 49.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill as amended.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

By unanimous consent the title was amended so as to read: "An act for the relief of homestead entrymen or settlers who enter the military or naval service of the United States in time of war."

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. STEVENSON for one week, on account of illness in his family.

OWNERS OF MINING CLAIMS IN MILITARY SERVICE.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I again ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table and consider Senate joint resolution 33. I would say that I have had a talk with the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] who objected before, and I feel that we can come to an agreement on this matter.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 33) to relieve the owners of mining claims who have been mustered into the military or naval service of the United States as officers or enlisted men from performing assessment work during the term of such service, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the provisions of section 2324 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which require that on each mining claim located after the 10th day of May 1872, and until patent has been issued therefor, not less than $100 worth of labor shall be performed or improvements made during each year, shall not apply to claims or parts of claims owned by officers or enlisted men who have been mustered into the military or naval service of the United States, so that no mining claim or any part thereof owned by such person which has been regularly located and recorded shall be subject to forfeiture for nonperformance of the annual assessments until six months after such owner is mustered out of the service or until six months after his death in the service: Provided, That the claimant of any mining location, in order to obtain the benefits of this resolution, shall file, or cause to be filed, in the office where the location notice or certificate is recorded, within 90 days from and after the passage and approval of this resolution, a notice of his muster into the service of the United States and of his desire to hold said mining claim under this resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GILLETT. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman a question. I have just listened to the reading of the bill. It says that until the soldier is mustered out of the service his rights shall continue. Why should it not read until the end of the war, because suppose a soldier should stay in the service all the rest of his life? If so, his rights would continue.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will allow me, all enlistments at the present time are for the period of the war, are they not?

Mr. GILLETT. That would not make any difference.

Mr. MONDELL. He might reenlist.

Mr. GILLETT. Exactly.

Mr. MONDELL. But this bill would not give him the benefit of the act under his new enlistment.

Mr. GILLETT. Why not? Suppose a man goes into the Army and continues in the Regular Army, as so many did after the Civil War; and suppose he should continue there throughout his life and should not be mustered out at all?

Mr. FOSTER. A resolution similar to this has been passed in previous wars, and there has never been any difficulty along that line.

Mr. GILLETT. I will not object to the consideration of it, although at first blush it strikes me that these words should be modified.

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I think the difficulty mentioned by the gentleman from Massachusetts should be corrected, and another difficulty should be overcome by inserting, after the word "States," in line 12, page 1, the words "to serve during the existing war with Germany."

Mr. FOSTER. There is a difficulty about that, I will say to the gentleman. There are some men enlisted who might remain in the Army for the term of their enlistment, and if they enlisted for four years or three years, or whatever the time might be, if the war should terminate before that time these men would lose their claims.

Mr. STAFFORD. You might say, "to serve during the term of their enlistment in the existing war."

Mr. FOSTER. Suppose a soldier enlists and at the end of the war he is still held?

Mr. STAFFORD. "To serve during their enlistment in the war with Germany."

Mr. FOSTER. I will say that I have no disposition except to get it so that these soldiers may have this right. Let the gentleman offer his amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FOSTER. Now, if the gentleman from Wisconsin will withhold his amendment, I will offer an amendment to strike out the proviso and insert the following.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the proviso beginning on line 5, page 2, and insert: "Provided, That the claimant of any mining location in order to obtain the benefits of this resolution shall file, or cause to be filed, a notice in the office where the location notice or certificate is recorded before the expiration of the assessment year during which he is so mustered, giving notice of his muster into the service of the United States and of his desire to hold said mining claim under this resolution."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 3, after the word "assessment," insert the words "during the period of his service."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 12, after the word "States," insert "to serve during their enlistment in the war with Germany."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to suggest to the gentleman from Wisconsin that a number of men in the National Guard have been serving for over a year on the border as a result of the Mexican trouble and have not yet been called into the military service of the United States on account of the German war; they were called forth as Organized Militia and will not be drafted for war with Germany until next August. It seems to me that there ought to be some protection for their rights in this bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. They are serving in the present war, and that is ample enough to protect them.

Mr. HAYDEN. The gentleman is positive about that?

Mr. STAFFORD. I think so.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. STAFFORD) there were 43 ayes and 4 noes.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 10, after the word "been," at the end of the line, insert "or may during the present war with Germany be."

Mr. FOSTER. I will say, Mr. Speaker, that I do not think that makes any difference one way or the other.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. My only object in offering it is to clarify what otherwise might be doubtful.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

PROTECTION OF DESERT-LAND ENTRANTS IN THE MILITARY OR NAVAL SERVICE.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 3331) for the protection of the owners of mining claims and of desert-land entrymen who enter the military or naval service of the United States in time of war. It only does for the desert-land entrymen what is done for the homestead entrants and the owners of mining claims.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, I desire to inquire of the Chair if this is unanimous-consent day?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. WALSH. Then, I object.

Mr. RAKER. I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. WALSH. I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, will not the gentleman let this go over until to-morrow?

Mr. RAKER. I think we had better dispose of it to-day.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I think the bill should be amended, and I hope the gentleman will withdraw his request and bring it up to-morrow morning.

Mr. FERRIS. We have just done this thing for the owners of mining claims and the homestead entrants, and it ought to be done, in all fairness, for the desert-land entrants.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would probably have no objection to-morrow, or even later in the afternoon, but there is suggestion now that the bill ought to be amended in some particulars.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Carr, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1816) to amend the act to regulate commerce, as amended, and for other purposes, had asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. NEWLANDS, Mr. ROBINSON, and Mr. CUMMINS as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

AVIATION STATIONS FOR ARMY AND NAVY.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 4892) authorizing the President to take possession, on behalf of the United States, for use as sites for permanent aviation stations for the Army and Navy and for aviation-school purposes, of the whole of North Island in the harbor of San Diego, Cal., and for other purposes, which I send to the desk and ask to have read. I will state that this is a bill for the purpose of enabling the United States Government to take possession of North Island in San Diego Bay, which is being used for aviation purposes. It is understood and believed by the department and the United States attorney general in that district that the property belongs to the United States Government, and in order that we may properly take care of and preserve any rights of anyone this bill is necessary.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause possession to be taken forthwith, on behalf of the United States, for use as sites for permanent aviation stations for the Army and Navy and for aviation-school purposes, of the whole of North Island, in the harbor of San Diego, Cal., and the provisions of section 355, Revised Statutes, shall not apply to the expenditure of any appropriations for improvements thereon for aviation purposes.

The Attorney General or the claimants to the said North Island are authorized to make application for the determination and appraisement of any rights private parties may have in the said island over and beyond any rights thereto in the United States to the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of California; the proceedings to be prosecuted in accordance with the laws of the State of California relating to the condemnation of property for public use. Either party may take an appeal from the judgment of such court direct to the Supreme Court of the United States within 90 days after such judgment is rendered. Upon the final ascertainment of the value of any right, title, or interest adjudged to be in any private claimants to the said island there shall be paid into court the value of the same as so determined, together with interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent per annum from date possession thereof was taken as herein authorized; and thereupon the United States shall be vested with title to said lands. The amount so paid shall be distributed by order of the court to the owner or owners of such right, title, or interest in said island as their respective interests may be determined by the court. The amount necessary to pay the awards in favor of private claimants is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise specifically appropriated, to be disbursed under orders of the Secretary of War.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, as I read the letter of the Secretary of War, Congress in former Army and naval appropriation acts has appropriated some $550,000 for the purchase of land for an aviation site on land in the Bay of San Diego. I wish to inquire of the gentleman whether that money will be sufficient to pay for this North Island?

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. President, I will say in reply to the gentleman that not only is it expected that this money will be sufficient, but also that we shall be able by the enactment of this legislation to save the whole of it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman explain the difficulty which has confronted the department officials in acquiring title to this land under the condemnation authorization which was carried in those respective acts? The report is not clear in that particular.

Mr. CALDWELL. The proposition is this: At no time were they able to get persons in possession of this property to fix a price upon it, and when they began to investigate the title for the purpose of starting condemnation proceedings—I think I am stating it right, and the gentleman from California [Mr. KETTNER], who is here, who knows all about it, will correct me if I am wrong—the United States attorney made an investigation as to the title, and after very careful investigation, after consulting with attorneys who had had experience with Mexican law and who had specialized in it, and after consulting with the Judge Advocate General and going over the title in extreme detail, they came to the conclusion that the United States Government owned the property, because by virtue of the treaty of Guadaloupe Hidalgo following the Mexican War with the United States the United States became possessed of all of the rights the Mexican Government theretofore had in the property of which this was a part. The ground upon which the Government can claim title here is that the property is to be used for national defense. That was reserved by the Mexican Government at the time they made their grant, and it has come down through the treaty to the United States. All we have to do is to legally authorize the possession of this for national-defense purposes and it belongs to us. However, if there is any question as to the authority of the United States Government or the right of the Government to this property, the bill preserves that right in every person who may claim the title and enables them to prove their case, and it protects them in every way that the law ought to protect private citizens of this country.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why should we authorize the claimants to make application for determination and appraisement of the private rights of parties to this land in addition to conferring that privilege upon the Attorney General?

Mr. CALDWELL. There are two very good reasons, but one is sufficient. The one I have reference to is the provision of the Constitution of the United States which says that you can not take private property without compensation; and if these people have any property at all, they ought to be given an opportunity to prove it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I said in addition to the right to be conferred upon the Attorney General. Why should not we merely vest that authority in the Attorney General to make this application for determination and appraisement of the rights of these private parties? The second paragraph of the bill provides that the Attorney General or the claimants to the said North Island are authorized to make application for the determination and appraisement of any rights private parties may have in the land. I should think that the procedure to be adopted would be that the Attorney General, acting on behalf of the Government, could go into court and ask for a determination and appraisement of the value of the rights of all parties interested. Why should we in this bill grant that right to some claimants to this land?

Mr. CALDWELL. The claimants would not start a proceeding unless they had some grounds for doing so.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why should not the Government, through its duly accredited officer, take possession of the land and proceed in court and ask for an appraisal and determination of the rights of the parties in interest?

Mr. CALDWELL. We want to be perfectly fair; that is all.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is difficult for me to understand why claimants should have this privilege when the Government goes ahead and takes possession of the land.

Mr. KETTNER. Mr. Speaker, perhaps I can explain that to the gentleman.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the Government did take possession of the land, the claimants would be barred unless some proceedings are had here.

Mr. STAFFORD. Under existing law the Government has a right to acquire this property.

Mr. KETTNER. The Government has had possession of this land for some six years and is using it at the present time.

There is just one claimant, John D. Spreckels.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And he would be the one who would have the right to go into court under this provision?

Mr. KETTNER. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. I have grave doubts of the legality of the bill unless we preserve any right that may be in these claimants unless it develops, of course, as we believe it will, that they have no right. If they had any kind of rights and we did not preserve those rights the parties might say we took the property without due compensation.

Mr. STAFFORD. The Attorney General goes ahead and calls into court all persons in a proceeding in rem?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. And all these private parties would have to come in or else their claim would be barred?

Mr. CALDWELL. Suppose the Government was seeking to take property to which you had a claim, would you expect the Government to come and take your property and expect the Government to start proceedings? Ought not you to have the right to start proceedings?

Mr. STAFFORD. I feel there must be some procedure on the part of the United States so as to get possession. I want to inquire of the gentleman from California what claim John D. Spreckels has to this property and how much he is attempting to hold up the Government for if he is holding it up at all, and why he is refusing to sell this property to the Government?

Mr. CALDWELL. I will answer the question if the gentleman will let me.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would be very glad to have an answer.

Mr. CALDWELL. I have never seen Mr. Spreckels in my life. I have never been in California, and I would not know him if I saw him. The circumstances are these: The reports of the various commissions we have authorized to investigate the proposition of getting an aviation site or a site for aviation in San Diego Harbor have uniformly reported that Mr. Spreckels refuses absolutely to surrender any right he has or offer property for sale, or in any manner do anything to assist the Government in getting this particular property. It is felt by these people that there are adjoining properties as good as this, but the department does not think so, and besides that I believe this property belongs to the United States Government and we want to get it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I want to inquire further in connection with the proviso in the naval appropriation act that authorizes the purchase of 232 acres in the Bay of San Diego, provided that the city of San Diego should donate free of incumbrance to the United States Government, a parcel of 500 acres of adjoining tidelands known as Dutch Flats without cost to the Government, whether that donation has taken place?

Mr. KETTNER. That donation has taken place, and the land has been accepted by the Government, and 232 acres have been purchased in the bay and fitted up for an advance marine base.

Mr. STAFFORD. How many acres in toto are involved in this?

Mr. KETTNER. About 1,200.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the evidence disclose any value at which it can be purchased?

Mr. CALDWELL. I have some information from Army officers who have visited the site and examined it as to the value of the property, and they report the real intrinsic value of the property is about a thousand dollars an acre. I understand, however, Mr. Spreckels feels it is worth a great deal more than that.

Mr. STAFFORD. How many acres did the gentleman say?

Mr. CALDWELL. There are about 1,200 acres. This property belongs to the United States Government, in my opinion, from an examination of such records as have been found.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then it would cost approximately $1,200,000?

Mr. CALDWELL. I do not think it would require an appropriation of one cent.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it the gentleman's opinion John D. Spreckels has no claim to this property?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman have any objection to striking out the omnibus provision as to the amount of money that may be available for the purchase of it and limit the amount to the appropriations that have heretofore been carried in the Army appropriation act and the Navy appropriation act—that is, some $550,000?

Mr. CALDWELL. I feel we would be perfectly safe in doing that; but at the same time I do not think it would be wise to do it. The information that is acquired is that, after three investigations, it is found to be the best piece of property in the United States for aviation purposes; and if we put a limitation upon the value and the money that is to be paid for any rights these claimants might have, they might be able to raise the question in the courts that we have taken the property without due process of law, and it may imperil the legislation when we need these things for the defense of this country; and I do not believe it is a wise proposition, as I understand it. I do not say that as a criticism of the gentleman's position in the matter, but I am saying this because the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, who have investigated this matter, and the attorneys who have examined it, have come to the conclusion that the Government owns the property, and we could probably have a saving of $550,000 if we pass this act.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I do not accept the gentleman's stricture——

Mr. CALDWELL. I do not mean it in the way of stricture at all; and if so, I beg to apologize if the gentleman takes it in that way.

Mr. STAFFORD. My object is to try to place some limitation on the purse strings of the Government and not vote in a haphazard manner millions for a site for aviation purposes in San Diego Bay. I am unwilling to allow this bill to go through unless the money which we voted in a prior Congress for these sites should be the amount available for the purchase of any private claims.

Those amounts are $550,000. I am not willing to allow John D. Spreckels or any other individual to hold the Government up to the extent of millions and millions of dollars without any control whatever over the amount that may hereafter be appropriated.

Mr. CALDWELL. Let me say this to the gentleman: The first $250,000, I am informed, has already been spent for the naval base. The $300,000 was for 300 acres that it was thought they were going to purchase on Coronado Heights. I would like, if the gentleman would withdraw his objection, to offer an amendment in this matter, although I have no authority from the committee that has authorized me to bring up this bill to consent, on behalf of the committee, to the amendment that he proposes. I think this House is perfectly able to pass upon that question.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does not the gentleman realize we should at this time place some restrictions on the amount of money that should be available for the purchase of this property?

Mr. CALDWELL. Without destroying the legislation, yes. Without that I do not believe so.

Mr. AUSTIN. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

OFFICERS OF PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask to lay before the House Senate joint resolution, there being on the Calendar of the House a bill (H. R. 4503) reported from this House of the same tenor.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask to have that reported.

The SPEAKER. That is what the Chair is going to do as soon as the resolution is found.

Mr. ADAMSON. It is on the Speaker's table.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, is it too late for me to move to suspend the rules and pass the bill that I had up?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not suspend the rules to-day.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BORLAND. Does it require unanimous consent to lay this before the House?

The SPEAKER. No. The Clerk will report the Senate joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 67) to fix the status and rights of officers of the Public Health Service when serving with the Coast Guard, the Army, or the Navy.

Resolved, etc., That when officers and other persons of the United States Public Health Service are serving aboard Coast Guard vessels in time of war, or are detailed for duty with the Army or Navy in accordance with law, they shall be entitled to all the rights, privileges, benefits, and allowances, including rights to pensions for themselves and widows and children, if any, as are now provided for officers of corresponding grade and length of service of the Coast Guard.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that is not regular business of the House and that it is not in order at this time.

The SPEAKER. Why not?

Mr. BORLAND. Because there is no special rule requiring that it should be laid before the House at this time. It is a Senate resolution.

The SPEAKER. The rule especially and particularly provides that when there is a Senate bill on the Speaker's table and a House bill of similar import on the calendar it is in order to lay it before the House.

Mr. BORLAND. It does not appear yet that there is a House bill of similar tenor.

Mr. ADAMSON. Here it is.

Mr. BORLAND. Even then the House bill would have to be brought up under the rules before the Senate bill could be substituted.

The SPEAKER. Oh, no; the gentleman is mistaken. It has been done a thousand times, more or less, since the gentleman has been here.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, may we have the Senate bill read?

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I was going to make that request.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate joint resolution.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, the House committee wants to make a few verbal amendments, and it is all right to offer them separately.

Mr. BORLAND. I make the point of order that that can not be done. If anything can be done at all it is to pass the Senate resolution, if it is identical with the House bill. If it is not identical it is not a similar bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I was going to offer some amendments.

Mr. BORLAND. I would like to know if amendments are in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so. It is the practice of the House. The resolution has been read.

Mr. BORLAND. I would like to take the floor in opposition, if I may.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a perfect right to be heard.

Mr. ADAMSON. Would the gentleman be willing to let me propose the amendment and then let him make his speech?

Mr. BORLAND. I would like to have them read for information.

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman, before he makes his speech, will allow me to read the amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. What is the status?

Mr. ADAMSON. I have got a request, and I have laid the Senate bill before the House, and one or two of the gentlemen wish to debate it. Now, I was going to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from Georgia going to offer an amendment?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes; if I can get the attention of the House I will be glad to do it.

I want to move to amend line 4, page 1, by striking out "aboard" and inserting "on." Also to amend, in line 5, same page, by inserting after the word "detailed" the words "in time of war." Then, I wish, in line 9 of the same page, after the word "officers" to insert the words "and persons." Then, I wish to add to the end by striking out the period and inserting a comma, the words "Army or Navy, as the case may be, and shall be subject to the laws prescribed for the government of the service to which they are respectively detailed." And also to amend the title.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will send up his amendments to the desk.

Mr. ADAMSON. I have them written here.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. ADAMSON moves to amend Senate Joint Resolution 67, as follows: Page 1, line 4, strike out the word "aboard" and insert the word "on"; page 1, line 5, after the word "detailed" insert the words "in time of war"; page 1, line 9, after the word "officers" insert the words "and persons"; page 1, line 10, at the end of the line, strike out the period and insert a comma and add the following: "Army or Navy, as the case may be, and shall be subject to the laws prescribed for the government of the service to which they are respectively detailed"; so that as amended the joint resolution will read:

"Resolved, etc., That when officers and other persons of the United States Public Health Service are serving on Coast Guard vessels in time of war, or are detailed in time of war for duty with the Army or Navy in accordance with law, they shall be entitled to all the rights, privileges, benefits, and allowances, including rights to pensions for themselves and widows and children, if any, as are now provided for officers and persons of corresponding grade and length of service of the Coast Guard, Army or Navy, as the case may be, and shall be subject to the laws prescribed for the government of the service to which they are respectively detailed."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] is recognized.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Missouri allow me, before he proceeds, just to state briefly the purpose of the bill? I just want a few minutes, and I will then reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BORLAND. Yes. I will be recognized after the gentleman.

Mr. ADAMSON. I will just state the purposes of the bill and reserve my time, and then the gentleman from Missouri will be recognized.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, a question of order.

The SPEAKER. What is the point of order?

Mr. STAFFORD. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. A House bill or resolution is reported to the House and is on the calendar. The Senate resolution is on the Speaker's table. It involves a charge on the Treasury. Should not this resolution be considered by the House as in Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so.

Mr. ADAMSON. Then I ask that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the resolution be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, what disposition as to debate does the gentleman intend to propose if it is considered in the House?

Mr. ADAMSON. I have no objection to liberal debate.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the gentleman any objection to amendments?

Mr. ADAMSON. Not at all.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection. The gentleman from Georgia is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, under the present law—whether good or bad I do not care now to debate—the surgeons of the Public Health Service are required to serve on Coast Guard cutters, and they may be detailed by the President in time of war to serve with the Army and the Navy. That is the present law. The further law is that the Cutter Service may in time of war be transferred to the Navy, which has been done during this war. There is no provision that the surgeons of the Public Health Service, if injured or killed in battle, either while serving with the Coast Guard or on a naval vessel or with the Army, shall have any pensionable status for themselves or their families.

We do not ask for anything for the Public Health Service in time of peace, or when not detailed, but we ask that when detailed with the Army or the Navy or with the Coast Guard Service, in case of injury or death in battle in time of war they shall be entitled to the same privileges of pensionable status as officers engaged in other branches of the service.

Mr. COX. So far as it applies to pensions, does it apply to officers or enlisted men in the Revenue-Cutter Service?

Mr. ADAMSON. It does not apply to the Revenue-Cutter Service. It applies to the Public Health Service. They may be detailed with the Coast Guard or with the Army or the Navy. It is simply just to say that when so detailed, under existing law, if they suffer death or injury or casualty they or their families should have the same pensionable status as other similar officers engaged in the other services.

Mr. COX. What do you mean by that phrase—"other persons"?

Mr. ADAMSON. It is members of the Public Health Service. They are of different grades. All of them are not surgeons.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. Certainly.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman be kind enough to state to the House what is the character of the naval or military service performed by these officers?

Mr. ADAMSON. They do not serve with the Army, but they go with the Army and Navy and serve pills and paregoric.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Are they out with parties engaged in military and naval enterprises?

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman will remember, if he heard me, that I stated——

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I understand what the law is now.

Mr. ADAMSON. You mean what they do now?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I mean in what capacity do surgeons of the Public Health Service serve with either of these same military or naval organizations? Do they have military and naval duties?

Mr. ADAMSON. They are not detailed if not needed. They may be detailed if needed.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Then they are extra men in addition to the surgeons in the military and naval service, who serve as a matter of course?

Mr. ADAMSON. We have use for every one of them outside the Army and Navy, but in case of war it is provided by existing law that if there are not enough in the Army and Navy they may be detailed.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. That answers my question.

Mr. ADAMSON. All this resolution provides is that when they are so detailed they shall have a pensionable status the same as those other branches of the service.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask an extension of time in order to answer these questions.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ADAMSON. Further answering the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GREENE], the service they will perform when detailed will be service that otherwise would be performed by the surgeons of the Army and the Navy.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. That explains the question, because otherwise it would be hard to see how or what a Public Health Service man had to do with military matters.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not care to go into a discussion of the law providing that they may be detailed when needed.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman has discussed this as a resolution to establish a pensionable status for these officers of the Public Health Service during military detail.

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. But the language of the resolution is very broad. It entitles them to all the rights, privileges, benefits, and allowances, including the right to pensions. The language of the resolution would seem to indicate that the matter of giving them a pensionable status was rather a secondary matter, and that there must be certain rights, privileges, benefits, and allowances that are the primary and perhaps the more important consideration. What is the nature of the rights, privileges, benefits, and allowances in addition to pensions which this resolution would confer upon these officers when detailed as proposed?

Mr. ADAMSON. I could not off-hand detail all of them, but it may be that they are put in there merely as safeguards to protect any that may exist.

Mr. MONDELL. Safeguards in whose behalf?

Mr. ADAMSON. For the surgeons in the Public Health Service. It is for their benefit. But whatever they may be, they are only such as would accrue when these men are detailed.

Mr. MONDELL. It strikes me, from a rather hurried examination of the matter, that it will be very proper and wise and just to give these men a pensionable status; but I think it is rather important to know, when we are doing that, what sort of rights, privileges, benefits, and allowances we are proposing to give to them in addition to pensionable status.

Mr. ADAMSON. I think that is intended to relate to the coast-guard law.

Mr. MONDELL. It might be construed as a right to draw rations, uniforms, and commutation of quarters.

Mr. BORLAND. And pay.

Mr. MONDELL. And pay, as the gentleman from Missouri suggests.

Mr. ADAMSON. The Coast Guard law makes provision for those who were in the Revenue Service and the Life-Saving Service, and makes reciprocal whatever benefits apply to each to apply to both. Whatever they may be, if these surgeons were injured while there on detail, they would be entitled to them.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman knows that sometimes we pass a law that seems entirely reasonable and proper, and then afterwards we discover that we have conferred rights and benefits that were not contemplated at the time; and this would seem to be a case where there is the probability of such things occurring. For instance, we passed a law which gave the men in the Coast Guard Service the right to retirement on three-quarters pay, and the conditions of employment in the Coast Guard Service are such that a man in that service often receives more money when he is retired than he received when he was in active service. Of course, that was not contemplated. That illustrates the importance of knowing just what we are doing when we are proposing to grant rights, privileges, benefits, and allowances.

Mr. ADAMSON. I will say to the gentleman candidly that what I was aiming at here was a pensionable status for these men.

Mr. BORLAND. Why not cut out the rest?

Mr. MONDELL. Why not eliminate everything else?

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. I should like to answer the gentleman's question, if I may have the time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman recalls that on several occasions—twice, at least, within my recollection—the Public Health Service have attempted to have added to their compensation commutation of quarters, the same as Army officers receive, and on each occasion the House defeated it. Now, unquestionably this would include that among the benefits, rights, and allowances that are given by that law, would it not?

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not think it would.

Mr. BORLAND. Does the gentleman think that all the rights, benefits, and allowances would include commutation of quarters?

Mr. ADAMSON. I will say for myself personally—I do not know how the other members of the committee feel—that what I was trying to do was to give them a pensionable status.

Mr. BORLAND. We can reduce it to that very quickly and easily.

Mr. ADAMSON. And if it is discovered later that there are any of these other things that they ought to have we can attend to that later.

Mr. BORLAND. Has it not been the constant effort of these gentlemen in the Public Health Service to put themselves on an equality substantially with Army officers in the matter of rations, pay, and allowances?

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman and I have always agreed on one question. There has been an effort to assimilate the Public Health Service to the military service, and I do not want that. I think this service can do forty times as much good by remaining a civil service, without mixing up with the Army; but in this case the law says that in time of war they may be detailed, and I want their widows to have pensions if they get killed; that is all.

Mr. WALSH. I notice that the resolution in the third line says—

That when officers and other persons of the United States Public Health Service—

Who are the "other persons"?

Mr. ADAMSON. They are not all surgeons.

Mr. WALSH. The letter of the Secretary of the Treasury seems to express his interest only in the commissioned officers of the service, but the resolution which you have called up here provides for other persons. What "other persons" are provided for besides commissioned officers of the Health Service?

Mr. ADAMSON. There are other officers besides surgeons, and there are officers who are appointed and not commissioned, and while they may not be directly detailed themselves, it may be necessary that some of them should go along as members of the party.

Mr. WALSH. But the language of the resolution would include the civilian employees, would it not?

Mr. ESCH. Hospital stewards, and so forth.

Mr. WALSH. And stenographers and messengers.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Taking up the thought of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], you are going to have a mixed personnel, including civilian employees who, under the language "persons," may be taken right over into the military service and given a status.

Mr ADAMSON. That language was not in the House bill originally. We consented to that.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Further, it is provided here that if they go into the Coast Guard Service, or if they go into the Army or Naval service, they shall have compensation and so on as provided for officers of corresponding grade and length of service of the Coast Guard. Now, that would make another inequality, because while they may be serving in the Army or the Navy by the side of men with standardized pay for the same kind of service, yet they will get only the pay of coast-guard men.

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. That will lead to more confusion.

Mr. ADAMSON. Does the gentleman want to strike out the words "other persons"?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I think those words are indeterminate.

Mr. ADAMSON. I am perfectly willing that they shall go out and that everything thing except pensions shall go out.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Does the gentleman offer that amendment?

Mr. ADAMSON. I will agree to that. I did not originate these things.

Mr. McKENZIE. In the Army and the Navy when a surgeon enters the service he is required to take certain examinations.

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Not only a physical examination, but a mental examination to show his qualifications.

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes

Mr. McKENZIE. Now, the way I read this bill, it seems to me these requirements will not apply to these gentlemen.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is all concluded by existing law.

Mr. McKENZIE. If a man is detailed from the Health Service you are providing to give him a pension when he goes into the service, and he may be a pensionable subject at that time. He ought to be required to take an examination at the time he goes into the service.

Mr. ADAMSON. The law is compulsory upon him to go in.

Mr. BORLAND was recognized.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield for me to offer an amendment?

Mr. BORLAND. I will.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment. Page 1, line 3, strike out the words "other persons," and in line 7, after the word "to," strike out the remainder of the line and the syllable "ing," and the word "rights," in line 8.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I will accept that amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 3, strike out the words "and other persons," and in line 7, after the word "to," strike out all of the remainder of the line and the syllable "ing," and the word "rights" in line 8.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I endeavored to get the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee not to bring this measure up to-day. We ought to be considering the bill against trading with the enemy. The Democratic leader thinks we ought to be considering the preferential shipment bill. There is nothing important about this bill except the fact that for two or three years——

Mr. ADAMSON. I want to say to the gentleman that we are going to bring up those bills as soon as we get through with this.

Mr. BORLAND. Well, if we had brought them up in the first place we would have got through so much sooner.

As I say, there is nothing important in this bill except that these gentlemen have for some reason been trying for two or three years to put themselves on the same status as Army officers. The truth about the matter is, that the Public Health Service fills a distinctive field. I have worked on the Appropriations Committee for enlarged appropriations for the sanitary survey by these officials, which is a part of their duty. Another essential part of their duty is the quarantine. This work herein is no part of their duty. The Army has a Medical Corps of its own, under proper examination and graded officers in title and rank. These men have no title and no rank, and to bring in a bill saying that when they are ordered into the Coast Guard Service—where they probably will never see an enemy—they are to be given corresponding rank in the Army and Navy means nothing. There is no corresponding rank. It is assumed that the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont cures the whole difficulty of the bill. It does cure nine-tenths of it. If it was merely to give them a pension, I do not think I would object, but what is the pension being given by this?

The gentleman from Pennsylvania says that these men are checked up from the civil service without a physical examination. We do not know but that they are pensioners now, the minute they are ordered into the service. Nobody can tell.

Now, if we had a pension law I do not suppose anybody would object to it, but the milk in this coconut is that they want commutations and quarters, which has been twice defeated by this House, and if I am not mistaken, it will be defeated every time it comes up. I do not think they are entitled to it. I would just as soon give commutation and quarters to the rural mail carriers or the railway mail clerks.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Under the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Vermont, if agreed to, they will not receive commutation and quarters.

Mr. BORLAND. That is true; that is all cut out. If all the amendments except that of the gentleman from Vermont are cut out, it will be practically harmless, except that there is no way of telling the pensionable status of these men to-day. All you have is the rank corresponding with the Army and Navy officers. I think the bill is inherently weak.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman says that these men have no rank. They are commissioned medical officers of the Public Health Service, are they not?

Mr. BORLAND. I do not know of any rank they have. They are surgeons.

Mr. WALSH. Surgeons in the Army have a rank.

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; surgeons in the Army have a rank up to first lieutenant, and I think, under the present law, captain.

Mr. WALSH. These men are medical officers in a time of war and are commissioned as surgeons.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I want to say to the gentleman from Missouri that I think under the present pension law there is no discrimination made by rank, all pensions for disabilities are on an equality.

Mr. BORLAND. Of the commissioned officers under the grade of colonel.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. All grades affected by this act.

Mr. BORLAND. If the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] will withdraw all of his amendments except the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont, it will relieve the bill practically of objections. Let me ask the gentleman the present status of this matter, are the amendments of the gentleman from Georgia pending or are they withdrawn?

Mr. ADAMSON. They are pending, but they are now harmless.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask for two minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman from Vermont has stricken out everything except the pensionable status.

Mr. ADAMSON. My amendments are harmless. One strikes out the word "board," in line 4, page 1, and inserts the word "on." Another inserts the words "in time of war," after the word "detailed," which is right, I am sure. I do not want to withdraw that. The other is at the bottom where it says, in addition to the Coast Guard, "Army or Navy, as the case may be,

and shall be subject to the laws prescribed for the Government of the service for which they are respectively detailed."

Mr. BORLAND. There is no objection to that.

Mr. ADAMSON. I want to add this much. The gentleman speaks about rank. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] has just reminded me, and I remember it, that the law creating and perfecting the health service does fix the rank of these surgeons.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Are pensions now provided by law for members of the Coast Guard?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. ESCH. I beg leave to suggest that there used to be pensions for the Revenue-Cutter Service, now the Coast Guard. That was repealed by the act of 1908, and by the act of 1915 in lieu of pensions we granted the widow or dependent children two years' salary and also provided retirement after 30 years' service.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Continuing that thought, why would it not be advisable in line 10 to strike out the words "Coast Guard" and insert "of the Army or Navy"?

Mr. ADAMSON. I will answer that. The law now requires them to serve on Coast Guard vessels, whether detailed to the Army and Navy or not.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I understand that, but in order to get a standardized pension. The gentleman says there is no standardized pension for the Coast Guard.

Mr. ADAMSON. There is. The statute says when detailed to the Navy the Coast Guard may draw naval pensions.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. That will take care of that.

Mr. ADAMSON. And they may be detailed to the Coast Guard when they do not go to the Navy.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I hope that we are spending useless effort, because I hope that none of these men will be detailed to the Army or Navy or to the Coast Guard. The Army and Navy have Medical Corps of their own, brought into the service in a qualified way, brought in with the idea of active service for a long period of years and with special examination for their fitness, differing from the examination these men are required to pass. That is one reason why they ought not to be detailed except in case of emergency. The second reason is this. These men have plenty to do as it is, and we are always met with complaints that there are not enough men in the Public Health Service, and we are importuned for larger appropriations to permit the hiring of men for rural sanitation and of more men for the quarantine service, and so on. There is no reason why those men should be displaced. The Medical Corps of the Army and the Navy should be filled up in the regular way, because if we detail these men we will have to fill their places. If these men want to seek commissions in the Army or the Navy, as many do, let them go at it in the same way that various other men are seeking commissions, namely, qualify themselves for the position they are seeking and get a commission and go into the Army or the Navy as the case may be. To detail these men and then to provide them with a blanket law for allowances will be a mistake. I trust there will not be any of them detailed. I hope the gentleman's amendment will be agreed to and the resolution passed in that form.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the first amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I think they are all well enough understood to vote upon them in a lump.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, may we have those amendments again reported?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report them again.

Mr. BORLAND. I suggest that the resolution is short, and that it be read as it would read if it were amended.

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, let us have the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 4, strike out the word "aboard" and insert the word "on"; page 1, line 5, after the word "detailed," insert the words "in time of war"; page 1, line 10, at the end of the line strike out the period, insert a comma and the following language: "Army or Navy, as the case may be, and shall be subject to the laws prescribed for the government of the service to which they are respectively detailed."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Adamson amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now report the Greene amendment.

The Clerk again reported the amendment offered by Mr. GREENE of Vermont.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Greene amendment.

The Greene amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Senate joint resolution.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ADAMSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

A similar House bill (H. R. 4503) was ordered to lie on the table.

FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution (H. Res. 112), which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That 20,000 copies of the act approved June 21, 1917, amending the Federal reserve act, be printed for the use of the House, of which 8,000 copies shall be delivered to the Committee on Banking and Currency, 1,000 to the document room, and the balance distributed through the folding room.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

AVIATION SITE FOR ARMY AND NAVY.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 4892, and I will say this is the same bill we had up, and I have agreed with the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] on an amendment that he has insisted upon limiting the compromise or settlement of $500,000, which is acceptable, I think.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. Let the bill be reported.

The SPEAKER. It has been reported, but the Clerk will read it again.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4892) authorizing the President to take possession, on behalf of the United States, for use as sites for permanent aviation stations for the Army and Navy and for aviation school purposes, of the whole of North Island in the harbor of San Diego, Cal., and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment on page 1, line 5, after the word "use," insert "for national defense and in connection therewith."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. The bill has not yet been read.

The SPEAKER. It was read this morning, but the Clerk will read it again.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause possession to be taken forthwith, on behalf of the United States, for use as sites for permanent aviation stations for the Army and Navy and for aviation school purposes, of the whole of North Island, in the harbor of San Diego, Cal., and the provisions of section 355, Revised Statutes, shall not apply to the expenditure of any appropriations for improvements thereon for aviation purposes.

The Attorney General or the claimants to the said North Island are authorized to make application for the determination and appraisement of any rights private parties may have in the said island over and beyond any rights thereto in the United States to the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of California; the proceedings to be prosecuted in accordance with the laws of the State of California relating to the condemnation of property for public use. Either party may take an appeal from the judgment of such court direct to the Supreme Court of the United States within 90 days after such judgment is rendered. Upon the final ascertainment of the value of any right, title, or interest adjudged to be in any private claimants to the said island there shall be paid into court the value of the same as so determined, together with interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent per annum from date possession thereof was taken as herein authorized; and thereupon the United States shall be vested with title to said lands. The amount so paid shall be distributed by order of the court to the owner or owners of such right, title, or interest in said island as their respective interests may be determined by the court. The amount necessary to pay the awards in favor of private claimants is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise specifically appropriated, to be disbursed under orders of the Secretary of War.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I now offer the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 5, insert, after the word "used," the following: "for national defense and in connection therewith."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 8, line 8, strike out the period and insert:
"Provided, That no compromise or settlement of claims for title to said land shall be made involving the payment of more than $500,000."

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, in connection with that amendment I will say that the amendment was agreed to by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] and was offered so as to avoid the objection which has been made to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. STAFFORD and Mr. CALDWELL) there were—ayes 39, noes 4.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CALDWELL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

TO AMEND THE ACT TO REGULATE COMMERCE.

Mr. ADAMSON. The Senate has just returned the bill we passed yesterday and asks for a conference, and I ask unanimous consent that we agree to the conference asked and insist on the amendments made by the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 1816, insist on the House amendments, and agree to the conference. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Chair announces the following conferees: Mr. ADAMSON, Mr. SIMS, and Mr. ESCH.

AMENDING THE ACT TO REGULATE COMMERCE.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up and pass the bill S. 2356.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill S. 2356, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 2356) to amend the act to regulate commerce, as amended, and for other purposes.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado objects.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, is a motion to suspend the rules in order?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not do it until next Monday.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I move we go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of this bill.

The SPEAKER. But objection is made, and that is the end of it.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I renew my request for unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman renews his request for unanimous consent.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I understand there is going to be some general debate, and that I am yielded 40 minutes.

Mr. RAYBURN. If I get that much time, the gentleman can get it all except one minute.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] had promised the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON] some time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand a word the gentleman from Georgia said.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman from Georgia said that the gentleman from Texas had promised the gentleman from Missouri and the gentleman from Michigan each time in general debate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Reserving the right to object, can I have five minutes?

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, pending that I want to ask to strike from the calendar a bill which was incorporated in the espionage bill, H. R. 3349, which ought to be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that that bill be laid on the table, because it has passed in another form. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, pending the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, I want to see if we can not agree upon time for general debate. Who opposes the bill on the committee?

Mr. ADAMSON. I would like to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] how much time they desire over there?

Mr. ESCH. It depends upon whether the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON] wishes time.

Mr. KITCHIN. Does the gentleman from Georgia want over an hour?

Mr. ADAMSON. Well, the gentleman from Missouri and the other gentlemen want an hour.

Mr. KITCHIN. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that general debate be limited to two hours, one hour to be controlled by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] and one hour by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON].

Mr. RAYBURN. Reserving the right to object, it has been agreed that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] have 40 minutes, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT], a member of the committee, wants 20, and my colleague from Texas [Mr. GARRETT] wants 5.

Mr. ADAMSON. Can the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] give the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON] his time?

Mr. ESCH. I desire to give him 30 minutes. We have had requests for time that will certainly take an hour.

Mr. KITCHIN. Let us make it two hours and a half.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to make a suggestion, if the gentleman from North Carolina will listen. Let the debate run until half past 5, and let the House adjourn and take up this bill in the morning.

Mr. KITCHIN. Let us agree to this, because, gentlemen, we have several important bills that we would certainly like to get through this week, so that we can have an adjournment over until Tuesday and from Tuesday until Thursday or Friday. And unless we can make some time we can not do that.

Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman be good enough to state to the House what the program is just now?

Mr. KITCHIN. There is a bill from this committee, the trading-with-the-enemy bill, that ought to get through.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will say to the gentleman in that connection that there have been numerous Members on this side who believe that that bill should not be pressed for consideration before we come back from our recess. It is a bill of the greatest moment, and one that has not been given the consideration I think it deserves, and I hope it will not be included in the gentleman's program.

Mr. KITCHIN. I would say this, that if it is going to be passed at all, it ought to be passed certainly before the last days of the session, and I would like to get through with everything except the revenue bill before we have the gentlemen's agreement that the House is going to pass, and then we will have only to wait for the bills that come from the Senate. I think we had better stay here until we dispose of the food bill. I understand now that it will probably be sent back Saturday or at least Monday or Tuesday.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman think that the legislation as reported to the Senate yesterday, in singling out the beverage of California and destroying the beverage of many other States, will pass in such quick order?

Mr. KITCHIN. I believe, after discussion with some of the Senators, we will probably get it back next week.

Mr. ADAMSON. I wish to state to the gentleman from Wisconsin that last Monday morning, when the gentleman spoke about the three days' recesses, he specified these two bills, and that he wanted them considered before they made an agreement.

Mr. STAFFORD. The trading-with-the-enemy bill has just been reported, and few Members have had opportunity to examine it.

Mr. KITCHIN. We have to-morrow and Saturday, and we can have Monday. We can come back Monday, and have Thursday, Friday, and Saturday with it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to say that I think that bill ought to be eliminated from the program at this time.

Mr. KITCHIN. Suppose, then, that we have this gentleman's agreement of three days' adjournment at a time, and have to wait until the revenue bill comes back from the Senate. We will be within a week or so then of adjournment. We will probably dispose of the food bill next week.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I would like to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin what was meant by the suggestion that the trading-with-the-enemy bill has not received consideration? Does he mean by the committee?

Mr. KITCHIN. We all want to get away while the Senate discusses the revenue bill, which will take three weeks. It will take them six weeks to understand the bill they have reported out. They will discuss it three weeks, and there will be no use of our sitting around here doing absolutely nothing in this sweltering weather, and that is what we would have to do unless we put this work off while the Senate is discussing the revenue bill. We can take in one week from now, to the last of next week, and pass them over to the Senate and have a gentleman's agreement to go away and stay three weeks.

Mr. GILLETT. You mean to stay here next week?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is aware that there is no quorum, or will not be, next week?

Mr. KITCHIN. There will be if it is necessary that they stay here to do this work. It will take about two days for the trading-with-the-enemy bill.

Mr. RAKER. And will this bill (H. R. 3321) for the relief of desert-land claimants have an opportunity to be considered?

Mr. KITCHIN. That will be a matter of unanimous consent. Anybody could object to that.

Mr. RAKER. I do not want to be cut out.

Mr. GILLETT. I was going to suggest to the gentleman that it seemed to me if we should carry out the original program and adjourn either to-night or to-morrow night and agree to recess for three days and agree that nothing should be done except by unanimous consent, it seems that by unanimous consent the food bill could be sent to conference and then the conferees could be occupied, and——

Mr. KITCHIN. If we would all agree on that we would not have to come back even for that.

Mr. MADDEN. I would do that.

Mr. GILLETT. I thought that would allow us to stay away until the conferees had agreed; stay, perhaps, a couple of weeks.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] will not agree to that.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I want to make a suggestion to the gentleman from North Carolina. He says that the trading-with-the-enemy bill will take two days.

Mr. KITCHIN. I said we ought to get through with it in two days.

Mr. FLOOD. The present law authorizing the issuance of permits for the utilization of water in the Niagara River above the Falls expires on the 1st of July, and it is very essential to the industries of that place that this bill should be passed before the 1st of July, because otherwise they will be cut off from the use of a portion of the water and the electrical power will be reduced and some of the industries will be stopped.

Mr. MADDEN. Some of those industries are making war supplies, are they not?

Mr. FLOOD. All of them are making either war materials or war supplies.

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not think it would take more than 10 minutes if the resolution involves nothing more than an extension of the time.

The SPEAKER. What does the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] suggest?

Mr. ADAMSON. I suggest that the debate on this bill be limited to two hours and a half, one half to be controlled by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] and the other half by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN].

Mr. FLOOD. General debate?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. FLOOD. I object. I was making a reasonable suggestion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia was making a reasonable suggestion.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The regular order, Mr. Speaker.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Oh, no!

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman withdraw it?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do.

Mr. FLOOD. My suggestion was that after the pending bill was taken up the Niagara Falls resolution should be taken up.

Mr. KITCHIN. How long does the gentleman think it will take to pass it, if he gets unanimous consent to take it up?

Mr. FLOOD. I think it could be passed in an hour or in half an hour. Of course, I could not say for sure.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I will say, in approval of what the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] has just said to the House, that the Niagara Falls joint resolution—not a bill—ought to be passed. It is one of exceeding importance.

Mr. CANNON. Is it on the calendar? If so, why not pass it now?

Mr. KITCHIN. I ask unanimous consent that it shall be in order to take up the joint resolution to which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] refers immediately after the passage of the bill now pending.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that immediately after the passage or defeat of the bill that is now pending, the joint resolution about Niagara Falls water shall be in order. Is there objection?

Mr. KEATING. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, how much of an extension is granted by this resolution?

Mr. FLOOD. For one year.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. KEATING. I will object for the present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado objects, and that is the end of that part of it. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] asks unanimous consent that the general debate on the pending bill be limited to two hours and a half, to be divided equally between the contending parties, one-half to be controlled by himself and one-half by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KITCHIN. I would like to state, Mr. Speaker, that the intention of the gentleman in charge of the bill is to pass this bill to-night or this afternoon before we adjourn. Gentlemen should remain.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] will take the Chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (S. 2356) to amend the act to regulate commerce, as amended, and for other purposes, with Mr. CRISP in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 2356, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 2356) to amend the act to regulate commerce as amended, and for other purposes.

Mr. BARKLEY. I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the order of the House, the general debate on this bill is limited to two hours and a half, 1 hour and 15 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], the chairman of the committee, and 1 hour and 15 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH].

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, the understanding is that I am to control the time on this side.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, this is a very short bill, and I do not intend to take up very much time in my preliminary statement, but will reserve some of my time for reply in case the bill is seriously objected to, which I feel certain it will not be.

Quite a misconception has floated around about the purposes of this bill, and about what its effect would be if enacted into law. We have had hearings this year, and we had hearings some time ago, on one provision of this bill, or another bill that had provisions in it that some people have interpreted to be similar to the provisions in this bill.

Some misconception has gone out in the proposition that this bill was a renewal of the fight of last session to pass a bill to prevent strikes upon railroads. I wish to assure the membership of the committee that if I know anything about what the English language means, and if other Members do who have participated in the writing of this bill know anything about what the English language means, there is not one word or syllable in this bill that seeks in any way to prevent men from quitting work when they choose. The Senate in passing this bill put in an amendment that says that nothing herein contained shall in any way repeal or abridge the powers or privileges conferred in sections 6 and 20 of the Clayton Antitrust Act. The House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, believing that they understood the language of this bill, struck that part out of the bill that they reported, believing and knowing, as far as I am concerned, that there is nothing whatever in this bill that would justify an appendage of that kind being placed upon it.

The first paragraph of this bill simply provides—

That on and after the approval of this act any person or persons who shall, during the war in which the United States is now engaged, knowingly and willfully, by physical force or intimidation, by threats of physical force obstruct or retard, or aid in obstructing or retarding, the orderly conduct or movement in the United States of interstate or foreign commerce, or the orderly make-up or movement or disposition of any train, or the movement or disposition of any locomotive, car, or other vehicle on any railroad or elsewhere in the United States engaged in interstate or foreign commerce shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and for every such offense shall be punishable by a fine of not exceeding $100 or by imprisonment for not exceeding six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

I contend that there is nothing in that language that would interfere in any way with men quitting any employment that they were engaged in, or that they desired to quit. When we use the words "by physical force," it seems to me, it makes that very plain indeed.

Mr. CARY. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. CARY. Would it do any harm to leave the section in the bill?

Mr. RAYBURN. I think it is wholly unnecessary, but when we come to the five-minute rule I am going to say that I have no objection to it.

Mr. CARY. I do not think it does any harm whatever.

Mr. RAYBURN. I think it is unnecessary, as far as that is concerned, but I do not object to putting it in the bill if it will appease anybody or satisfy anybody. I shall not object to it. But on the other hand, I do not believe that the right should be given to anybody to interfere with interstate commerce in this country, and especially in time of war, by violence, by physical force, any more than they should be allowed the privilege of interfering with the mails of the United States; and the provision in this bill, as I read it and as our committee interpreted it, simply places interstate shipments and foreign shipments during this war upon the same plane that the mails of the United States are placed upon, and under practically the same penalties.

Mr. TOWNER. Before the gentleman passes section 1, I will ask him is paragraph 1 of the present House bill essentially the same as paragraph 1 of the Senate bill with the exception of the proviso?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; I think it is exactly the same.

Mr. TOWNER. And what changes, if any, have been made in the second paragraph, from the Senate provision? Is the gentleman going to point those out?

Mr. RAYBURN. I hope to, yes.

Mr. TOWNER. There are some changes?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Before the gentleman proceeds, will he kindly explain the necessity of vesting in the Federal courts the jurisdiction of the acts described in this first section. As they would constitute felonies under the various State laws, what is the necessity of transferring the jurisdiction?

Mr. RAYBURN. I realize, sir, that that is a very important suggestion, but I am supporting the bill as the House committee reported it, and on the other hand when we go into this field of legislation we occupy the field and it seems to me it would be a hard matter to deprive the Federal courts of jurisdiction.

Mr. TOWNER. If it is a matter relating to interstate commerce, would it not be necessary to confer jurisdiction upon the Federal courts?

Mr. RAYBURN. They do try these cases in the local courts many times. I think if a man throws a rock through a car window the courts have interpreted that he is interfering with interstate commerce, but they usually try such cases in the local courts. That is my understanding about it. Of course, it is a Federal offense anyway, and this simply gives the right to try it in a Federal court. When the Congress legislates on this subject it puts them in the Federal court, and we can not legislate without putting them in the Federal court.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Would it not be a good idea to give the Federal court jurisdiction with the State court, and in that way not entirely deprive the State courts of jurisdiction?

Mr. RAYBURN. I do not know; probably I am not a good enough lawyer to say whether or not we might give them both jurisdiction; whether after Congress passes on this question we could say that the State court could try the cases instead of the Federal court.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. COX. I am for the bill as it was reported by the House. As I read the first paragraph of the Senate amendment, it provides exclusively for interference with the interstate commerce on railroads.

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. COX. Is there any provision of any sort in the Senate amendment that applies to interference with interstate commerce on rivers? If there is, I can not find it.

Mr. RAYBURN. I do not know whether it is broad enough to cover that question that the gentleman asks or not, but I should think it is.

Mr. COX. I was wondering if it would not be wise to add a provision to it that they shall not interfere with interstate commerce on rivers as well as railroads. When you enumerate in a statute what you are driving at, it precludes anything else unless you enumerate it. The first paragraph amounts to a designation of interference with interstate commerce on railroads. You say that it applies to railroads, locomotives, cars, trains, and so forth, engaged in interstate commerce. I think the fair construction is that only interstate commerce on railroads is sought to be prevented.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The gentleman will note that beginning in line 15 it says:

That during the continuance of the war in which the United States is now engaged the President is authorized, if he finds it necessary for the national defense and security, to direct that such traffic or such shipments of commodities as may be essential to the national defense and security shall have preference or priority in transportation by any common carrier by railroad, water, or otherwise.

Mr. COX. I observe that, but when you enumerate specifically, as you do in the first section, what kind of commerce you seek to prevent interference with, my opinion is that when the court comes to construe it they will construe it to be interference with interstate commerce on railroads.

Mr. TOWNER. I think the gentleman is correct, but let me make this suggestion: In line 22, page 5, the language is—

That on and after the approval of this act any person or persons who shall, during the war in which the United States is now engaged, knowingly and willfully, by physical force or intimidation, by threats of physical force, obstruct or retard, or aid in obstructing or retarding, the orderly conduct or movement in the United States of interstate or foreign commerce, or the orderly make-up or movement or disposition of any train, or the movement or disposition of any locomotive, car, or other vehicle on any railroad or elsewhere.

Now, if there are other items referred to of the same general character, the gentleman's interpretation would be correct, but in specifying the movement or disposition of any locomotive, car, or other vehicle on any railroad or elsewhere, those particulars would not be such as would include the general statement.

Mr. COX. It may be that it would not.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Would it not be well to insert after the word "commerce," in line 24, page 5, the words "by land or water"?

Mr. RAYBURN. This is interstate commerce, and I think there is enough in the provision to cover interference with interstate commerce on rivers.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman believe that this bill is strong enough to prevent our brethren, the railway officials who brought on the strike of last year, from bringing on another one in time of war?

Mr. RAYBURN. No; I do not.

Mr. COX. The gentleman thinks they would have the power to do it.

Mr. RAYBURN. There is nothing in this bill to prevent or control strikes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. What is the purpose of the first section?

Mr. RAYBURN. I have stated that as plainly as I could. Now, I must not yield further, for I can not use more than 10 minutes. The second paragraph of the bill provides that during the continuance of this war in which the country is engaged the President of the United States will have the power to make preferential shipments, and we believe that is a necessary power that should be lodged in the President, and that the railroads when under these orders shall be held to be immune from prosecution, as it is against the law regulating commerce.

Now, there are one or two other provisions that were changed from the Senate bill. A discussion of them will be found on the last page in the report of the bill.

One was that about keeping up a general agency here in Washington to control the railroads of the country. We do not go into the proposition of taking over the railroads or operating the railroads, but we did believe this to be much wiser and much simpler, that the President of the United States should be given the power to direct the railroads to do the things we want done rather than to take over the railroads and have an agent here in Washington to give instructions to the railroads as to how they should operate their business under instructions by the President. Therefore we struck that proposition from the bill.

The proposition of allowing the carriers to go back to the old system of pooling we did not believe was a wise one, and we also struck that from the bill.

Another provision that we changed, the Senate amendment would require that the cars should be promptly furnished by the railroad companies of the country, and less than two weeks ago we passed a bill which has been signed by the President covering the full proposition of car shortage, we did not think there was any use of rehashing this proposition in the bill.

With these three changes in the bill, and with the proposition struck out about repealing section 6 and section 20 of the Clayton Antitrust Act, we have the same bill as passed the Senate. We have stricken out the whole bill passed by the Senate and substituted the one we desire, which will help get the matter into conference when the Senate refuses to agree to our amendments. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have promised to yield an hour and five minutes of my time, and I will close. [Applause.]

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to have printed in the RECORD, to be read in my time, a letter from Mr. M. E. Foster, the president of the Houston (Tex.) Chronicle Publishing Co. and editor of the Houston Chronicle, on the subject of the zone postal rates. It is a very patriotic letter, which I think will do good if read in the RECORD and considered by the solons at the other end of the Capitol while they are considering the revenue bill. I ask to have this read in my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE HOUSTON CHRONICLE,
Houston, Tex., June 15, 1917.

Hon. DANIEL E. GARRETT,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR JUDGE: I thought Congress had acted wisely and well when it adopted in its war-revenue bill the section which provided for a graduated postal rate, effective July 1. What is known as the zone system of postal rates has always impressed me as being the only sensible way of handling newspaper postage. It is certainly not good business to charge the same price for sending a paper from Houston to Galveston by mail as from Houston to New York.

The graduated zone system is the proper system, and I can't see how anyone could find anything wrong with it. Quite naturally it may hurt some of the magazines that are now given a postal rate that is practically a subsidy; but from the standpoint of fairness and justness, it is the proper system, and would undoubtedly bring the Government much additional revenue.

If it is true, as claimed, that second-class mail is handled by the postal department at a loss of close to $90,000,000 a year, then there is all the more reason why a zone system should be established. In my opinion, it should be maintained not only during the war period, but for all time to come.

Increased postal rates are really not a tax in the proposed section 1201; it is simply a charge for service, and in my opinion a most proper charge. No other institution on earth would carry big bundles of newspapers or magazines 5,000 miles at the same price as for 50 miles. Let us have the zone system in preference to a tax on gross business in any department or special extra taxes on our net incomes.

While it may be true the Government has carried some newspaper and magazine mail at a loss, this, in my opinion, has been due to the lack of a business system rather than to any other cause. Even now the express companies will frequently carry newspapers within a certain zone at a considerably lower price than the United States Government under its all-inclusive blanket system of second-class postal rates.

I do not think publishers want anything that could be called a subsidy. We want freedom of expression and the right to conduct our business in accordance with constitutional guarantees. We believe that a free press is absolutely essential to this great Republic, and that it is to the interest of the Government to see that newspapers are given the widest circulation possible.

The United States Government could make little or no progress in its present fight for the world's freedom without the aid of the press of this country. We have given this aid freely and without hope of reward or financial recompense. In the matter of the liberty loan we came to the rescue of the Government, and that loan could not have been made popular, nor could it have been oversubscribed or even subscribed, had it not been for the fact that the newspapers gave it their editorial indorsement and gave column after column and page after page of space for impressing the necessity and value of the liberty bonds.

In the matter of registration we came to the aid of the Government, and in the matter of recruits our columns have been thrown open for the use of the War Department in all its branches day after day and week after week.

The newspapers of the United States are doing all this work without being paid one cent for advertising by our Government, which is in strong contrast with the methods used in England and Canada, where many hundreds of thousands of dollars were spent for newspaper advertising, both in securing recruits and in making bond issues popular.

Please bear in mind that every newspaper worthy the name is willing and anxious to do its part in this crisis. If the Government wishes to take all our profits, I am entirely willing to submit. I do not want certain industries penalized, however, while others are allowed to go free.

Our present fight for world-wide freedom should make every man and every industry willing to furnish the Government all the aid possible. I am sure the newspapers are willing to give their columns freely and to give a good portion of their profits or all of their profits. I know the Houston Chronicle is to-day subject to the command of Woodrow Wilson. I am for him, and our paper and our business is offered to him and this Government freely and fully.

Yours, very truly,

M. E. FOSTER,
President.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to pose as the censor of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, nor to impose conditions upon Members of this honorable body as to what matters they shall insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, but I appreciate that I possess the right as a Member of this House to object when unanimous consent is asked for any purpose, including extension of remarks in the RECORD, particularly when requests have been made along lines such as have been followed during this session. The manner in which the privilege accorded has been taken advantage of since this session began has come to be, in my opinion, an abuse of the privilege, and borders closely in many instances upon an imposition upon the orderly observance of the rules of the House. I have taken the liberty of compiling the extensions which have been made during this session, after a fairly careful examination of the RECORD, and I find that since April 2 up to yesterday the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD has been used for the extension of remarks in the following instances and manner: Twenty-nine poems, some of which perhaps are thought to be epics and have been started on the eventful journey along the corridors of time; 70 articles, interviews, statements, comments, and so forth, upon all manner of subjects, grave, gay, serious, and sad; 54 editorials, some of them commenting upon the proceedings of the Congress and some of them fairly oozing wisdom and dripping with knowledge; 26 speeches, in most instances, delivered by persons not Members of either branch of Congress, some of which are well worthy of careful reading; 169 letters, upon nearly every subject but love; 123 resolutions; and 723 telegrams, and 534 telegrams were inserted in the RECORD by one gentleman, 483 of them on one day in large type such as is used for the printing of the speeches made on the floor of the House, 8 point I believe it is called, occupying nearly 19 printed pages, and 51 of that number were inserted on the following day, and marvelous or unfortunate though it be, these were in smaller or 6-point type, and 140 of the number were inserted by another gentleman upon the 28th of April, these also in the smaller type. I submit to the House that when extensions are made to that extent under unanimous consent they reach the point where they may be correctly considered as bordering on an abuse of the privilege. The additional cost for the entire edition of the RECORD I can not state, but I believe it might well have been saved. The gentleman who was so profuse in his extension of remarks as far as telegrams went, which occupies nearly 19 pages of the RECORD, was kind enough to send a letter to each Member calling his attention to the extension lest, perchance those 19 pages in the RECORD of that day should have escaped the notice of the membership of the House. The entire RECORD of the proceedings of the House for that day occupied but about 38 pages, and nearly 19 additional pages were used in the extension of the remarks of this particular gentleman. I desire to say it is my intention when I am present, in an effort to help conserve the supply of print paper, that whenever Members, irrespective of upon which side of the aisle they may sit, ask unanimous consent to extend their remarks in the RECORD for the insertion of editorials, poems, songs, extraneous speeches and addresses, and telegrams, to object. I have no personal grudge nor do I desire to be considered as making any personal reflection upon anyone's character, much less to be custodian of anybody's conscience.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman enlighten the House as to who it was that extended his remarks by the insertion of these telegrams in the RECORD?

Mr. WALSH. If the gentleman did not read them I refer him to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 20 and 21.

Mr. PLATT. Those are the very things that I never think of looking at in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON].

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, international law is defined as "the rules which determine the conduct of the general body of civilized States in their dealings with one another." (Lawrence.)

Some writers divide the so-called modern period of international law into four parts:

1. From the peace of Westphalia, which closed the Thirty Years' War in 1648, to the peace of Utrecht, in 1713.

2. From the peace of Utrecht to the congress of Vienna, in 1815.

3. From the congress of Vienna to the call for the first Hague peace conference, in 1898.

4. From the call for the first Hague peace conference down to the present time.

But future writers will make a new division of time, beginning with the war which is now convulsing the world.

The Czar of Russia, who proposed the first Hague peace conference, is dethroned and is a prisoner in his former palace and Russia is in the throes of revolution.

The first Hague peace conference was composed of representatives of 28 states, and its purpose was to substitute reason for brute force, to formulate peace conventions, to mitigate the cruelties of war, and to discourage war.

The second Hague peace conference, composed of representatives of 44 States, met June 15, 1907, "for the purpose of giving fresh development to the humanitarian principles which served as a basis for the work of the first peace conference of 1899."

It pronounced in favor of compulsory arbitration, and all its conventions were framed in the interest of civilized warfare when war could not be avoided.

It recommended the assembling of a third peace conference after an interval equal to that which had elapsed between the first and second conferences and adjourned with the hope everywhere expressed that "the parliament of man and the federation of the world" was about to be ushered in.

Since that time every rule of civilized warfare has been violated. Systematic frightfulness, which has made horror and hell weak words in the human vocabulary, has been adopted as a policy of war. Neither childhood, womanhood, nor age has been spared. Every barbaric method of causing suffering and death has been revived, and every scientific method of killing has been resorted to.

Squadrons fight in the air above armies greater than the world has ever known.

Dead lines are drawn across the sea and submarines lurk below the surface to strike and kill without mercy.

The rights of neutrals are ignored. The world has become accustomed to deeds of cruelty that four years ago were thought to be possible only among savages.

THE BEGINNING OF THE WAR.

The shots fired by an assassin on the 28th of June, 1914, demonstrated the flimsy foundation upon which the world's hope of peace was founded.

In his work called The Psychology of the Great War, Gustave Le Bon condenses the beginning of the war into this paragraph:

Germany and Austria were drawn into the war by a series of psychological errors, among which was the conviction that France, England, and Russia would not intervene.

When Germany saw that Russia was not only not yielding to her threats as she had anticipated, but was mobilizing, she feared to let her adversaries get the start of her in their military preparedness, and in obedience both to the suggestions of the military party and to her own convictions that England would remain neutral, made a demand of Russia to demobilize. When Russia refused, Germany declared war upon her.

The Archduke Francis Ferdinand, heir to the Hapsburg throne, and his morganatic wife, the Duchess of Hohenburg, were assassinated at Sarajevo, the capital of Bosnia, June 28, 1914, on the occasion of their first official visit there after the annexation of Bosnia and Herzegovina in 1908.

By virtue of the treaty of Berlin in 1878 Austria-Hungary entered upon the occupation and administration of Bosnia and Herzegovina, with the ultimate purpose of annexation.

But when, on October 7, 1908, Francis Joseph addressed a proclamation to the people of Bosnia and Herzegovina declaring them to be his subjects, conditions were not propitious for annexation.

Turkey and Montenegro protested to the powers which had signed the treaty of 1878 that Francis Joseph's action was in violation of that treaty, and that annexation could not be consummated without their consent, and two of them—Great Britain and Russia acquiesced in this construction.

There was deep antagonism among the Slavs against this annexation.

A Pan-Serb movement had been for a long time in progress for the incorporation of Bosnia and Herzegovina in a greater Serbia, hostile to Austria and in sympathy with Russian Pan-Slav aspirations.

When the Archduke Francis Ferdinand was shot it was charged by Austria that his assassination was part of this Pan-Slav movement.

DIPLOMATIC CORRESPONDENCE.

In outline, the diplomatic correspondence during the crowded week before the war began shows that—

Thursday, July 23, 1914:

The Powers were informed that, in consequence of the assassination at Sarajevo, Austria-Hungary had sent an ultimatum to Serbia demanding that she should accept the collaboration of representatives of the Austro-Hungarian Government "for the suppression of the subversive movement directed against the territorial integrity of the monarchy," and fixing a time limit of 48 hours.

The brevity of this time limit paralyzed efforts at peace and is probably responsible for the war.

For it Germany is in part responsible, because she says in her White Book that she "gave Austria an entirely free hand against Serbia."

Friday, July 24:

Russia asked Austria to extend the time limit fixed in her ultimatum. The French ambassador at St. Petersburg called attention to the fact that the short time limit "increases the difficulties in the way of the restraining influence which the powers of the triple entente might otherwise exert at Vienna."

But the British ambassador at Vienna reported that the "Austrian minister was under instructions to leave Belgrade unless Austrian demands were accepted integrally by 4 p. m. tomorrow."

Saturday, July 25:

England proposed that she herself, together with Germany and Italy, should mediate between Austria and Russia. But Austria refused to extend the time limit.

Sunday, July 26:

Russia intervened at Vienna in favor of Serbia and asked Germany's cooperation.

But Austria ordered partial mobilization.

Monday, July 27:

According to the Blue Book (English), Germany accepted in principle mediation between Austria and Russia. But according to the Orange Book (Russian), the German ambassador at Paris "insisted that the idea of any possible mediation or conference must be excluded."

To justify her uncompromising attitude, Austria published this note:

Serbia has for a long time been agitating to separate the southern Slavs from the Austro-Hungarian Monarchy in order to unite them in a great Serb State. This propaganda on Serbian soil has always had the same object, although it has employed different means and has been more or less violent upon different occasions. Its culminating point was reached at the time of the annexation crisis.

Tuesday, July 28:

Germany upheld Austria's uncompromising attitude.

Austria ordered general mobilization and declared war against Serbia.

Russia then requested England's mediation.

Wednesday, July 29:

Germany advised resumption of negotiations between Russia and Austria.

Russia ordered mobilization in territory bordering on Austria.

Germany threatened to mobilize if Russia did not stop preparations.

Russia stated that she could not stop because Austria maintained her attitude.

Thursday, July 30:

Russia promised to stop military preparations if Austria would admit that her quarrel with Serbia was of European interest.

Friday, July 31:

Negotiations were resumed between Russia and Austria, but Germany announced that Russia's military preparations made it necessary for her to prepare.

Saturday, August 1:

Germany sent an ultimatum to Russia demanding that she demobilize within 12 hours.

Austria reconsidered and announced her willingness to recognize that Europe had an interest in her quarrel with Serbia.

Russia attempted again to avert war by announcing that she would be satisfied with an assurance of the independence and territorial integrity of Serbia.

At 7 o'clock the evening of August 1 Germany declared war on Russia.

At 7 o'clock in the evening of August 2 Germany delivered an ultimatum to Belgium demanding the right of way through Belgium.

On August 3 Germany declared war against France.

It is argued that Austria refused to modify her demands, and Germany backed her in her refusal because they both believed that neither Russia, France, nor England would intervene; that they believed Russia would not intervene because she had not intervened (but only protested) when Austria seized Bosnia and because she had domestic troubles, and that they believed France and England would remain neutral because France was disputing about her military system and England was hampered by domestic troubles.

England entered the struggle when Belgium's neutrality was disregarded and her territory invaded by Germany.

BELGIUM'S NEUTRALITY AND THE TREATIES OF 1831 AND 1839.

Belgium was governed by the King of Spain in the seventeenth century, by the Emperor of Austria in the eighteenth century, and was annexed to France in 1792.

In 1814, after Napoleon's first abdication, Great Britain, Prussia, Austria, and Russia agreed that Holland and Belgium should be joined in one kingdom, to be known as the Netherlands, and ruled by William of Nassau.

The union between Holland and Belgium was unpopular. Increasing discontent compelled the King to call upon the Five Powers—Great Britain, France, Prussia, Austria, and Russia—for assistance, and on November 4, 1830, a conference of the Powers met at London, and in January, 1831, decided that Belgium should be an independent, neutral State.

On November 15, 1831, a treaty was signed at London between the Five Powers and Belgium, the first 24 articles of which defined the terms of separation between Holland and Belgium and their respective boundaries, but the King of Holland refused to accept the 24 articles.

It was not until 1838 that he agreed to them, and on April 19, 1839, three treaties were signed—one between Holland and Belgium, one between the Five Powers and Holland, and one between the Five Powers and Belgium.

In each of the two treaties of the Five Powers with Holland and with Belgium, the Five Powers guaranteed the 24 articles.

By these treaties Belgium became an independent, neutral State, guaranteed by the Five Powers, and since that time there has been no change in her boundaries or international position except by the annexation of the Congo independent State, in 1882.

I do not undertake here a discussion of the somewhat complicated history of the Duchy of Luxemburg and the Duchy of Limburg.

THE TREATIES OF 1870.

In 1870, war having broken out between France and Prussia, Great Britain negotiated two treaties for the protection of the neutrality of Belgium—one with the Emperor of the French, the other with Prussia and her allies.

In the treaty with the Emperor of the French, England agreed to cooperate with France to defend the neutrality of Belgium in case of its violation by the North German Confederation and in the treaty with Prussia and her allies she agreed to defend the neutrality of Belgium in case of its violation by France.

In both treaties England agreed not to engage in war outside Belgium, and the treaties were to remain in force during the war and for 12 months thereafter.

THE FIFTH HAGUE CONVENTION.

Not only was Belgium neutralized by the treaties of 1831 and 1839, but "in time of war she shares in the common law of neutrality as defined by the provisions of the Fifth Convention of The Hague, in 1907. Thus the protection assured her was a double one. As a neutralized State she could not on any possible ground be regarded as an enemy; as a neutral State she had a right to the general immunity conferred by the common law of neutrality in case of any conflict arising among the other powers." (Belgium's Case, by De Visscher.)

In the Fifth Hague Convention, of 1907, respecting the rights and duties of neutral powers in war on land, referred to by De Visscher, it is declared in Article 1 that "the territory of neutral powers is inviolable"; in Article 2, that "belligerents are forbidden to move across the territory of a neutral power, troops or convoys, either of munitions of war or of supplies"; and in Article 5, that "a neutral power ought not to allow on its territory any of the acts referred to in Articles 2 to 4."

These declarations were unanimously adopted by The Hague conference and were ratified by Germany November 27, 1909.

GERMANY'S ADMISSION OF VIOLATION OF BELGIUM'S NEUTRALITY.

Some German jurists have argued that Germany was not bound by these provisions because Article 20 of the fifth convention declares that the provisions of the convention "are only applicable between the contracting powers, and only if all the belligerents are parties to the convention."

But at the time—the morning of August 4, 1914—when Germany violated the neutrality of Belgium Germany had declared war only on France and Russia, and all four of the powers concerned had ratified the convention.

But Germany herself has fixed upon herself the responsibility for the violation of Belgium's neutrality by the public declarations of her own Chancellor.

On the very day—August 4, 1914—on which the German soldiers entered Belgium Chancellor von Bethmann-Hollweg, in a historic speech in the Reichstag, declared "our troops have occupied Luxembourg and perhaps are already on Belgian soil. Gentlemen, that is contrary to the dictates of international law. * * * Necessity knows no law. We were compelled to override the just protest of the Luxembourg and Belgian Governments. This wrong—I speak frankly—we will endeavor to make good as soon as our military goal has been reached.

"Anybody who is threatened as we are and is fighting for his highest good can only have one thought—how he is to hack his way through."

Some six weeks later—September 14, 1914—von Bethmann-Hollweg confirmed what he had said in the Reichstag by a communication addressed to the Ritzau Bureau in Copenhagen, which was published in the Berliner Tageblatt, the same day, in which he said:

"It is true that we have violated Belgian neutrality because we were driven to it by hard necessity. But we fully guaranteed the integrity of Belgium and also the payment of an indemnity if she would consent to recognize this necessity." (Belgium's Case, De Visscher.)

Since that time Germany has exacted enormous tribute from stricken Belgium, destroyed her cities, killed her people, tortured her people, starved her people, deported her people, enslaved her people. For these crimes there is and never was any law of necessity or otherwise.

Some biased historians may try to extenuate the violation of Belgium's neutrality. Some few may seek to justify the war on Belgium; but if one-tenth part of the stories of horrible cruelties which have come from the blood-soaked soil of Belgium are true, if one-tenth part of the entries of hideous cruelties in the notebooks of German prisoners are true, the memory of them, the horror of them, can never fade from human history.

Posterity with shuddering eyes will quickly turn the leaves of this chapter of the unspeakable crimes of the instruments of a civilization which claims for itself the highest culture.

THE DECLARATION OF WAR ON FRANCE.

But what was Germany's "highest good," of which von Bethmann-Hollweg speaks? Why was she "hacking her way through" Belgium? What was her "military goal"?

Obviously, her immediate "military goal" was the siege and destruction of Paris and the levying of tribute upon France. Having conquered France, she meant to devote her attention to Russia.

France had not declared war against Germany. France had committed no act of aggression against Germany; neither had she intervened in Austria's quarrel with Serbia.

Germany's declaration of war against France stated an obviously trivial pretext. The German Ambassador at Paris called at the French Foreign Office at 6.45 in the evening of August 3, 1914, and presented this document:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The German administrative and military authorities have established a certain number of flagrantly hostile acts committed on German territory by French military aviators. Several of these have openly violated the neutrality of Belgium by flying over the territory of that country; one has attempted to destroy buildings near Wesel; others have been seen in the district of Eifel; one has thrown bombs on the railway near Karlsruhe and Nuremberg.

I am instructed and I have the honor to inform your excellency that in the presence of these acts of aggression the German Empire considers itself in a state of war with France in consequence of the acts of this latter power.

According to M. Lauzanne, editor in chief of the Matin, on May 18, 1916, Dr. Schwalbe, burgomaster of Nuremberg, declared, in a statement published in the Deutsche Wechenschrift, that "the rumor that bombs had been thrown by French aviators on Nuremberg or its railway were utterly untrue."

All the statements of alleged fact in the declaration of war against France have been denied, but if true they constituted no ground for war.

UNDERLYING CAUSES OF WAR.

We must go back of declarations for "the remote, deep-seated, and varied causes which had been slowly piling up until the day when their effects swarm suddenly into our ken."

The Sarajevo incident was not the cause, but the occasion of the war.

The Austrian ultimatum to Serbia was drawn in a form to make acceptance impossible.

If the Austrian ultimatum had been less peremptory—if time for deliberate negotiation had been given—war might have been postponed for a time, but the Armed Peace, with its monstrous burden of taxes which the nations of Europe had imposed upon themselves, could only end in war.

It produced in Germany a military autocracy upheld by the landed nobility.

In the presence of this landed nobility and this military aristocracy what there was of German democracy could make no headway.

The military aristocracy, which expressed itself in large standing armies, was inspired by the cynical doctrine that might makes right and that the strong alone deserve to live.

It is difficult, almost impossible, to summarize and analyze the invisible forces that lay behind visible events and controlled events.

Religion, patriotism, philosophy, and poetry were invoked to gild, glorify, and justify nationalism backed by the sword. Race ideals, race prejudices, race jealousies, race arrogance, and commercial rivalry—all these responded to the invocation of Force.

Difference in national ideals made mutual understanding difficult.

A SCRAP OF PAPER.

A single circumstance will illustrate the mental differences that make it difficult for one nation to understand the motives that govern the conduct of other nations.

On August 4, 1914, when notified by the English ambassador at Berlin of the request of England that Germany withdraw its ultimatum to Belgium and reply to England before 12 o'clock that night, Chancellor von Bethmann-Hollweg became greatly agitated and said: "The step taken by the English Government was terrible; just for a word, 'neutrality'—a word which in war time had so often been disregarded—just for a scrap of paper, Great Britain was going to make war on a kindred nation."

The German Chancellor's inability to understand why a nation should feel itself bound by its signature to a treaty, "a scrap of paper," was not the detached, eccentric reasoning of one man, but expressed the views not only of himself but of eminent German thinkers.

THE DOCTRINE OF FORCE.

The doctrine that might makes right and that the German ideals of civilization ought to be imposed upon the world is urged and sustained by Tretschke, the eminent historian, whose philosophy is epitomized in this sentence, quoted from his Germany and England, by Bernhardi, in his book called Germany and the Next War:

Among all political sins the sin of feebleness is the most contemptible. It is the political sin against the Holy Ghost.

The doctrine that might makes right is upheld by Prince Bulow in his Imperial Germany.

By Prof. Paulsen, of Berlin.

By Rudolph Eucken, of the University of Jena, who says, "To us more than to any other nation is intrusted the structure of human existence."

By Gerhart Hauptmann, the distinguished German dramatist.

By Prince Bismarck, as quoted in Lowe's Table Talk, based on Poschinger's Biography.

By Prof. Hugo Munsterberg, in his book, The War and America, pages 135–137.

By Prof. Ostwald in a recent article in the Journal de Genéve, in which he says: "Germany, thanks to her genius for organization or social efficiency, has attained a state of civilization far higher than that of all other peoples. This war will in the future compel these other peoples to participate under the form of German social efficiency in a civilization higher than their own. * * * You ask me what it is that Germany wants. Well, Germany wants to organize Europe, for up to now Europe has never been organized."

It is strongly advocated by Gen. von Bernhardi and many other German writers.

By her historians, her philosophers, her patriotic societies, and her system of military education, Germany has shaped the public thought of her people, who believe in their foreordained superiority over other nations.

The small but war-like kingdom of Frederick's time has become a mighty Empire, and, with her power, her pride has grown.

Because her defeat of France in 1871 had made Germany great, it was natural to argue that the subjugation of France in 1914 was necessary to enlarge her greatness.

Because Germany had been made by war, it was not illogical from Gen. Bernhardi's standpoint to argue that "war is the father of all things" and that "it is not only a biological law but a moral obligation, and, as such, an indispensable factor of civilization." He declares that "from the first appearance in history the Germans have proved themselves to be a civilized nation of the first rank, and, one may say, the civilized nation."

In the tenth chapter of his book, Unsere Zukunft (Our Future), he says:

In its undertakings a State should consider only the factor of force, disregarding every law except that of its own advantage.

Can we endure that a nation which has only 40,000,000 people, and which has already been defeated by Germany, should now dare to prescribe limits to her expansion?

We can secure Germany's position on the Continent only if we succeed in smashing the Triple Entente, in humiliating France, and giving her that position to which she is entitled.

The middle European States, which are at present independent, must be joined to Germany. Until we have crossed swords with England our foreign policy is condemned to failure.

Not only army and navy but our foreign policy also must be ready for immediate action.

In his chapter on "International Arbitration," he says:

Might alone, and not right, is capable of settling disputes between great States.

Every nation has its own standard of justice and its own ideals and aspirations. These arise necessarily from its character and history. * * * No one can tell whether the one or the other is right.

General treaties of arbitration must be particularly pernicious to an ambitious and rising nation, such as Germany, which has not yet reached the highest point in its political and national development.

One can not apply the conception of individual morality to that of the State.

The morality of a State is a thing by itself.

It must be in accordance with its peculiar nature and be founded upon its character and purpose, exactly as individual morality must be founded upon the personality of the individual and its duties toward Society.

The essence of the State is power, and its weakness is a sin.

It is immoral if a State does not strive to extend its power, if such extension is required by an expanding population. * * *

Nations must never allow themselves to be bound by treaty obligations which endanger the existence of the State, and are disadvantageous to it.

This is a strange philosophy in the opening years of the twentieth century. It is the gospel of brute force. If it prevails, the hands of time will be turned back to despotism.

WHAT ANSWER?

It is difficult to think of a collective, national German mind with ideals like this.

For myself I am compelled to believe that the policy of Brute Force and "Frightfulness" characterizes the aristocracy and dominates the militarism of Germany, but I decline to believe that it characterizes the German people.

I know too many noble, high-minded, humane, Christian German men and women to believe that.

The cultured, individual German as we know him is a student, a reader, a thinker, a lover of art, a man of ideals.

The average individual German as we know him is industrious, methodical, honest, and loyal to his adopted flag.

These men and women came here to escape militarism; they came here to escape the iron walls of caste; they came here because our flag means widened opportunity.

The German Nation as we have been accustomed to think of it is a nation unified and disciplined in thrift and technical training by an industrial system; a nation organized for business, with laboratories in which specialists study practical problems to produce marketable results, the whole dominated by a military aristocracy.

But we have not thought of Germany as an outlaw among the nations.

At the beginning of the war the Kaiser addressed his army in these words:

Remember that the German people are the chosen of God. On me, as German Emperor, the spirit of God has descended. I am His weapon, His sword, His viceregent. Woe to the disobedient; death to the cowards and unbelievers.

Germany claims for herself the highest civilization.

If there could be a supreme court of civilization before which the Germany of the Kaiser could be summoned to defend herself, what answer could she make to the charge of violating the neutrality of Belgium?

Her answer would be "Guilty." She has admitted her guilt by the declarations of her Chancellor.

After centuries of unspeakable horror, in which the unarmed people of invaded territory were tortured and murdered by the light of their burning homes, there has been established a law of civilized nations.

By that law "noncombatants are exempt from personal injury except in so far as it may occur in the course of the lawful operations of warfare."

By that law "the inhabitants of captured towns are not to be abandoned to the violence of the victorious soldiery."

By that law "the principle of humanity in time of war marks the line between savagery and civilization."

Germany claims for herself the highest civilization.

What answer can military autocratic Germany make to the charge of burning men, women, and children alive in their burning homes; of bayoneting girls and children; of the torture, mutilation, and rape of women; of the cutting off of hands; of the putting out of eyes; of the disemboweling of noncombatant men, women, and children; of shooting men, women, and children in masses; of forcing the living to dig the graves of their murdered dead; of the killing of priests; of the deportation of women and children to work in Prussian fields under the bayonet; of the separation of families and the deportation of thousands into slavery?

What answer can she make?

Will she dare to use Maj. Gen. von Disfurth's justification, published in the Hamburger Nachrichten?—

> Frankly we are and must be barbarous if by these we understand those who wage war relentlessly and to the uttermost. * * *
> Germany stands as the supreme arbiter of her own methods, which in time of war must be dictated to the world.
> They call us barbarous. What of it? We scorn them and their abuse. For my part I hope that in this war we have merited the title of barbarians.

Will she adopt Maximillian Harden's answer?—

> Let us drop our miserable attempts to excuse Germany's action. Not against our will and as a nation taken by surprise did we hurl ourselves into this gigantic venture. We willed it. We had to will it. We do not stand before the judgment seat of Europe. We acknowledge no such jurisdiction. Our might shall create a new law in Europe.

SINKING SHIPS AND KILLING AMERICANS.

No principle of international law is better settled than that war shall be so conducted as to spare noncombatants from injury and death.

Before this war and for five months after it commenced no man ever dreamed of claiming that belligerent nations had a right to kill noncombatant citizens of an enemy nation.

But what answer can the Germany of the Kaiser—the Germany of military aristocracy—make to the charge of a deliberate, methodical policy of killing not only noncombatants but the killing of neutrals?

On Christmas Eve, 1914, Admiral von Tirpitz declared in an interview the policy of his Government to sink every merchant ship belonging to the allies, and February 4, 1915, he proclaimed a war zone in the sea around the British Islands, including the English Channel, and declared that "every merchant ship found in the said war zone will be destroyed without its being always possible to avert the dangers threatening the crews and passengers."

Sixty days later the Government of the United States warned the German Government that if its policy caused "the death of any American citizens, it would be difficult for the United States to view the act in any other light than as an indefensible violation of neutral rights for which this Government would be concerned to hold the German Government to a strict accountability."

All jurists agree that the right of search belongs by the common law of nations to belligerents and to belligerents only. It is, as Judge Story said in the case of the Marianna Flora, "allowed by the general consent of nations in time of war and limited to these occasions." (Lawrence, 210.)

By the law of nations when grounds are found for seizure "the captor is under obligations: (1) To conduct the seizure with due regard to the person and property of the neutral, (2) to exercise reasonable diligence to bring the capture to a port for its adjudication, and (3) to guard the capture from injury so far as within its power."

But Germany did not propose to capture merchant ships nor to bring them into port. Her proclaimed purpose was to destroy all merchant ships found within the arbitrary zone she had prescribed.

Her purpose was not alone to destroy the merchant ships of her enemies but the merchant ships of all neutrals.

Her purpose was not only to take the lives of passengers and crews on the merchant ships of her enemies but to take the lives of passengers and crews on the merchant ships of neutrals, and, notwithstanding her promise of February 16, 1915, she proceeded to execute her purpose.

March 27 she sunk the British passenger ship Falaba and killed an American citizen.

April 28, 1915, she attacked the American steamer Cushing by airships.

May 1 she attacked the American tank steamer Gulflight by submarines.

May 7 she sunk the British liner Lusitania, with 2,500 noncombatants on board, and more than a thousand men, women, and children went down, 137 of whom were Americans.

May 24 she sunk the American steamer Nebraskan.

June 28 she sunk the British ship Armenia and drowned 20 Americans.

In answer to the protest of our Government on July 8, 1915, Germany replied "that American ships will not be hindered in the prosecution of legitimate shipping, and the lives of American citizens on neutral vessels shall not be placed in jeopardy."

But she disregarded her promise and went on sinking ships and killing Americans.

Between July 9 and September 4, 1915, she sunk six ships, the Orduna, the Leo, the Leelanaw, the Arabic, the Nicosum, and the Hesperian, and killed 25 Americans.

Again, December 1, 1915, the German Government promised our Government that—

> Liners will not be sunk by our submarines without warning and without safety of the lives of noncombatants, provided that liners do not try to escape or offer resistance.

But she disregarded her promise and went on sinking ships and killing Americans. Between December 3 and December 29 she sunk four more ships, the last one, the Persia, carrying 500 passengers, of whom 335 were drowned, including an American consul traveling to his post.

Answering our further protest January 7, 1916, the German Government assured us that submarines were permitted to destroy enemy ships "only after passengers and crews have been accorded safety."

But she disregarded her declaration and went on sinking ships and killing Americans.

In the month of March, 1916, she sunk eight ships, and on April 8, in presenting the case of the Sussex, the United States informed Germany that if it was still her purpose "to prosecute relentless and indiscriminate warfare against vessels of commerce by the use of submarines without regard to what the Government of the United States must consider the sacred and indisputable rules of international law and the unanimously recognized dictates of humanity," this Government would have no choice but to sever diplomatic relations.

Answering May 4, 1916, Germany assured our Government that she had issued new orders "in accordance with the general principles of visit and search," and that no American lives would be taken or vessels sunk without warning and without opportunity to escape.

THE LENGTHENED DEAD LINE.

But on January 31, 1917, Germany notified our Government that from and after February 1 she would forcibly prevent all navigation, "that of neutrals included," in a zone around Great Britain, France, and Italy, and that "all ships met within that zone would be sunk" and all sea traffic stopped with every available weapon and without further notice.

This new German dead line surrounds an area of a little less than a million and a half square miles, without counting the prohibited Mediterranean area.

If Germany can run a line down the twentieth degree of longitude west from Greenwich and order us not to cross it, she can with the same propriety run a line down our eastern coast and order us off the sea.

THE BRITISH "MILITARY AREA."

But some gentlemen argue that notwithstanding the fact that Germany proclaimed a war zone around the British Islands and included therein the width of the English Channel, and notwithstanding the fact that she extended that zone to include an immense area of the Atlantic Ocean and the Mediterranean Sea, and notwithstanding the fact that she has taken the lives of American citizens and destroyed their property, still she is no more culpable than Great Britain, and since we have declared that war exists between Germany and the United States we ought to declare that war exists between Great Britain and the United States.

Let us examine this. What cause have we to go to war with Great Britain?

It seems clear that if Germany had done no more to us than Great Britain no one would have proposed war, although we protested against every act of England that encroached upon our rights.

November 3, 1914, Great Britain declared the North Sea a military area, and announced that all ships not following an indicated course would be in grave danger from mines that she had laid in retaliation against the act of Germany in mining the North Sea pursuant to her notice to neutral nations on August 7, 1914, that she would close the trade routes to English ports by mines.

Pursuant to her notice, Germany had not only mined the ports of England on the North Sea but had mined the ports of England on other waters and had scattered mines indiscriminately in the open seas and on the main trade routes from America to Liverpool.

Both England and Germany then had mined the North Sea, but Germany had mined the English Channel, the open sea, and the main trade routes to America.

By article 2 of The Hague Convention of 1907 "it is forbidden to lay automatic contact mines off the coast and ports of the enemy with the sole object of intercepting commercial shipping."

Against the action of both Governments we protested, but we did not propose to go to war about it.

THE BRITISH BLOCKADE.

Again, by order in council in further retaliation against Germany, the British Government instituted a so-called blockade, effective from and after March 1, 1915, against the ports of Germany, by which:

1. Goods on board ships bound to German ports were ordered discharged in British ports, placed in the custody of the marshal of a prize court, and if noncontraband, and not requisitioned for British use, they were to be restored to those entitled to them on terms prescribed by the prize court.

2. Goods on board ships bound from German ports were ordered discharged in British or allied ports, and if discharged in British ports, they were ordered placed in the custody of the marshal of a prize court and if not requisitioned for British use they were to be detailed or sold under direction of the prizé court, and the proceeds paid into court subject to disposition by the court.

3. Goods the property of enemies or of enemy destination on board ships bound to ports other than German ports were ordered discharged in British or allied ports, and if discharged in British ports they were ordered placed in the custody of the marshal of a prize court, and if not contraband and not requisitioned for British use they were to be restored to those entitled to them by order of the court on terms prescribed by the court.

4. Goods the property of enemies or of enemy origin on board ships bound from other than German ports were ordered discharged in British or allied ports, and if discharged in British ports they were ordered placed in the custody of the marshal of a prize court, and if not requisitioned for British use they were to be detained and sold under direction of the prize court, and the proceeds paid into court subject to disposition by the court.

5. Provision was made that persons "claiming to be interested in or to have any claim in respect of any noncontraband goods may, by a prescribed writ, apply for an order restoring the goods to them or that the proceeds shall be paid to them or for such other order as the circumstances may require."

THE DIFFERENCE BETWEEN DOLLARS AND LIVES.

The law requires that a blockade shall be effective. This British order in council was not effective. It did not blockade the German Baltic ports against Scandinavian traders, but we did not propose to go to war about that.

In practice, and against our protest, Great Britain presumed goods bound for neutral Scandinavian ports to be of ultimate enemy destination, but we did not proposed to go to war about that.

In practice, and against our protest, our people were wronged by delays, but we did not propose to go to war about that. Against our protest, our mails were delayed, but we did not propose to go to war about that.

On March 1, 1915, in announcing the British order in a speech in Parliament, Mr. Asquith said:

"If, as a consequence, neutrals suffer inconvenience or loss of trade, we regret it; but we beg them to remember that this phase of the war was not instituted by us. We do not propose to assassinate their seamen or destroy their goods, and what we are doing we do solely in self-defense."

Germany not only methodically assassinated our seamen but she assassinated our people generally. She not only destroyed our goods and destroyed our ships but she killed our people.

Germany declared war on France because, she said, French airplanes had flown across the French boundary, although no claim was made that any life had been lost or any human being injured; but we would not have gone to war with Germany for destroying our ships or our goods, and we abstained from a declaration of war even after she had killed 137 American men, women, and children by sinking the Lusitania.

But when she gave us notice that she proposed to go on sinking our ships and killing our people, no choice was left to us but to declare war.

She drew her dead line and challenged us to cross it.

We accepted the challenge in the name of humanity, and we fight under the flag of a Nation "consecrated to liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal."

We have never fought except for liberty, and we fight for liberty now.

This war we hope means that democracy will rule the world.

It means we hope that autocracy has made its last stand.

And when this war is over, America will sit at the conference of nations, where the destiny of nations will be settled for peace.

Then God grant the prophecy of Carlyle may come true:

"Man has walked by the light of conflagrations and amidst the sound of falling cities, and now there is darkness and long watching until the morning.

"Birds of darkness are on the wing, specters arise, the dead walk, the living dream.

"Thou, Eternal Providence, will cause the day to dawn."

[Prolonged applause.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT].

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, before proceeding to a discussion of the merits of this bill, I think I should say that we ought to congratulate ourselves upon having had the opportunity of hearing one of the most elucidating as well as one of the most interesting résumés of this war situation. [Applause.] I sometimes have thought that there would be great expedition of business in this House if we could abolish the RECORD, or at least a large portion of it; but if the RECORD were abolished, and thereby we should have been deprived of the learned address which we have just heard, I think we would have had a deprivation we could not very well endure.

Sometimes I hear criticism in regard to another matter, and that is particularly in regard to the conduct of the business in this House. The press of the country, and, I am sorry to say, a great many people in the country as well, regardless of the energy of the newspapers, have taken the anomalous position, during this Congress particularly, that the House of Representatives has been lax in its duties; that we have not furthered and promulgated and hurried legislation in regard to these great war measures. I know that it is very easy to criticize; in fact, that is the easiest thing in the world to do, except one other, and that is to give advice. Some wise man said at one time that advice is the easiest thing to give and the hardest thing to take. It is quite easy for newspaper editors and for those who are engaged in other avocations than that of being legislators to criticize the conduct of this House; and I am now speaking not in a party sense, because I recognize the fact that, had it not been for the ability, assiduity, and learning of the gentlemen on the Republican side of the aisle, much of this legislation that we have passed here would not have been accomplished. And therefore I speak in an unpartisan sense entirely. Now, let us look at our records in regard to that criticism. This House has passed a $7,000,000,000 loan bill. It has also passed a bill in regard to $2,000,000,000, which $2,000,000,000 have been oversubscribed by the people of the United States. It has passed laws by which 9,500,000 men have been called to the colors by conscription, or speedily will be if required for such use. It has created an Army of 575,000 men, 432,000 of those being volunteers or militiamen and 460,000 being in the Regular Army. It has passed a revenue bill in this side of the legislative Chambers raising a revenue of $1,800,000,000. It has passed a compulsory-insurance bill for seamen who are now engaged in work upon the high seas.

It has passed an espionage bill, the wisdom of which some people questioned, and against which there was much criticism by reason of these very same newspaper authorities, but after the matter was framed properly it passed this House and passed the Senate and is now the law of the land. It passed a food-control bill, and it did that in one week, regardless of the opposition that there seemed to be and regardless of extraneous matter that was brought into the consideration of the bill, to wit, the question of prohibition, and, be the merits of that what it may be, be the opposition to it what there may be, notwithstanding the fact remains that this matter of conservation was passed in this House and was given due and deliberate thought. We passed and Army and Navy deficiency bill prior to that time, and then day before yesterday we passed a bill for rivers and harbors bearing an appropriation of $27,000,000, and yesterday we passed a bill creating two memberships in the Interstate Commerce Commission, all of this, my friends, having been done during the period of 90 days.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. I will.

Mr. MEEKER. The gentleman ought not to overlook the bill passed by the Agricultural Committee.

Mr. DEWALT. Yes; and the great agricultural bill. There is a record, gentlemen, it seems, as a new legislature, I have reason to be proud of, although I took no active part in any of these measures. I am simply referring to this to say that I believe that much of this criticism against the action of legislators is unwarranted; that it ought to be refuted, and we as Members of this House should stand up for what we believe to be our rights and privileges in defending ourselves against these attacks. [Applause.]

Now, as to the necessity for this bill we have before us: This bill provides in regard to the matter of supplies, and the gist of it is found in the sixth page thereof:

That during the continuance of the war in which the United States is now engaged the President is authorized, if he finds it necessary for the national defense and security, to direct that such traffic or such shipments of commodities as may be essential to the national defense and security shall have preference or priority in transportation by any common carrier by railroads, water, or otherwise.

Now, that is the gist of this bill.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Does the gentleman attach no importance to the preceding paragraph?

Mr. DEWALT. Oh, I do, yes; and while there are matters of great importance there are matters of minor importance, but I am referring now to the meat in this coconut.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. This is the most important.

Mr. DEWALT. The kernel in the nut.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. DEWALT. I desire to address my argument as to what is the necessity for this legislation. The necessity for the legislation—and anyone who is a thinking man and desires to review the situation can be very well informed by perusing hereafter the speech that was made by Brother HAMILTON, which would be a very formidable introduction to what I propose to say. But let us take the situation just as it is in regard to the necessity for this bill. What is it? You and I have read the newspapers and we find all sorts of rosy reports now emanating from the best censored articles as to the food situation in England and France. Now, frankly, I may say I do not take everything found in those reports as the absolute truth. I do not believe we have the German side of this story, but take it at the best the fact remains that for three years almost—it will be three years on the first of August—those people have been combating with the strength of giants, with all their resources, and up to this time it seems to be what we would call a "stalemate," but the results have been this: Belgium is devastated, absolutely at the mercy of the conqueror, the German war army. France is denuded of her strength; "bleeding white" is the expression. England, although she is said to have a force of 2,500,000 men that have never yet gone into the trenches, is battling on the frontier and holding in check the western boundary of the German Army, yet the fact remains they have taken all their men for fighting that they can. Now, what follows as a corollary? It follows as a corollary that they have no men to produce food. But you would say, what is the effect of this argument? We are the Nation that must produce the food and munitions of war if called upon to do it, but what good does the food do unless we have an opportunity to ship it and get it to the ports and deliver it to those people when they need it? Now, that is the purpose of this bill. It gives the President of the United States the authority, when he deems it necessary for the security of the national defense and for the welfare of this country during the war, to insist and demand that the common carriers of this country shall stop their ordinary business, go into the extraordinary business, if you please, of carrying whatever the President demands shall have priority. Now, what are the German resources? They say they are exhausted. Allow me to say they have conquered Poland.

I understand that Poland is to be given a separate government, and I have been told by those who have recently come back from Germany, and from Poland as well, that the consideration of the promise by the German Government to Poland is this, "We will grant you a semiautonomous government, but you, Poland, must furnish us 1,000,000 men for our German Army."

More than that, they have taken the fruitful fields of Belgium; they have taken the fruitful fields of France; they have taken the people of Belgium and made them do the work upon the fields in Germany, so that they have commandeered, if you please, the prisoners of war and made them do the agricultural work and thus increased their food supply. When we people here in America talk about the German people being without their resources, we are talking like fools. This is not a picnic by any means, and this fight, in my judgment, is not nearly over. It must be remembered that the German Government owns all the railroads in Germany, and they have not pledged one mile of those railroads yet, and they can raise millions of dollars on them. Why, they have raised already $16,500,000,000 in six different loans, and they have not touched their mines or their railroad securities as yet. Beyond that, as I have said, they are using the forces that they have taken from the governments that they have partially conquered and have taken the fields over which they have run and made them productive for their own use.

Now, to resume. With these facts confronting us, knowing that we are called upon as the parties who must furnish food, that we are the parties who must furnish munitions of war, that we particularly are the parties who must furnish coal and oil, because those are the two great necessaries that France and England are now crying for in this war—knowing these facts, what then can we say in reference to this bill? Simply this, that although we may have the fuel, we may have the oil, we may, if you please, conserve all our food supplies, we may go so far, if it carries in the Senate and is brought back here into conference and finally signed by the President, that no man in the country may drink a glass of beer during the continuance of the war by reason of our necessities in the conservation of food, all that will do no good. The conservation of the food supply is simply the initial portion of this program. You must get some means for sending your supplies to the shipping place, and that shipping place is what? The seaboard of America. And more than that, you must have the privilege and authority given to the President to see that the water carriers of this Nation shall give priority to those shipments across the broad Atlantic.

Now, my friends, I have tried in just as succinct a way as possible—and I do not know whether I have exhausted my time or not; I hope I have not, because I desire to surrender some of it—but briefly and succinctly I have tried to show you what I believe is a necessity here and the way of meeting it.

Some people have said in opposition to this measure that it gives the President of the United States too much authority, that it gives him the right to say that the railroads shall be under his dictation. Is there any warrant for that? I do not remember the fact, but I do remember that my progenitors—my father and my grandfather—told me that during the War of the Rebellion a very celebrated Pennsylvanian, by the name of Thomas Scott, took charge of all the railroads in the United States in the northern territory, and they were commandeered by no less a man than Lincoln, and he said, "We will do it, with or without war."

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMSON. I will ask the gentleman in charge of the bill to yield you as much time as I consume.

Just on that point, a great deal has been said here and elsewhere about granting autocratic power to the President. I wish to say that the purpose and effect of this bill are directly the opposite of that. Last year the Army bill contained a provision authorizing him to take over all the carriers in the country and operate them for the benefit of the Government. Apprehending grave consequences from that, we persuaded him to accept a mitigation of that provision, and, with the approval of the administration, we got up this plan, merely to authorize him to issue orders to the railroads as to preferential shipments and pay them for their services rather than encumber the Government by taking the railroads over. It reduces the autocratic power already authorized by the Army bill of last year, and simply makes the Government a preferred shipper on the railroad. That is all there is to it.

Mr. DEWALT. I am very glad to have my chairman assure me of that fact. And I am quite confident of another thing, that if the chairman of this great Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce goes to see the President often enough he will persuade him to almost anything; and after a while I hope he will be persuaded to do something which we all have in mind, which is not at present for publication.

Coming back to the gist of my argument, and that is that this does not grant autocratic power to the President of the United States. It provides he can take charge of these railroads, so far as what? So far as compelling them by direct order or by orders given through him to another that they shall give priority to shipment; not that they shall take charge of the railroads, as was well said by the chairman; not that they shall have the operation of the railroads; not that they shall commandeer those who have charge of the operation of the railroads; not that they shall enlist in the forces of the United States the brakemen and engineers and others, if you please, because those were the provisions of the bill my chairman referred to a few moments ago, but simply that priority of shipments shall be enforced at the direction of the President of the United States.

But further than that, this bill goes on to say that when that priority is given and when such shipments are made the railroad companies shall be reimbursed, and they shall be paid what? They shall be paid a moderate charge for their services.

And who shall make that charge? The railroad company? No. The President of the United States? No. But those charges shall be given to the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Now, my friends, as before said, I have tried in as succinct and as definite a way as possible to explain the provisions of the bill, and——

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. Can you inform the committee as to what has been the policy of the railroads during the last three years as to giving priority to munition shipments to Europe? What has been the general policy as to that?

Mr. DEWALT. So far as the committee has been informed it has been this, although I can not say as to the last three years, but within the last 18 months there have been meetings consecutively by the great railroad men of this country, and they have in every possible way, so far as the committee is informed, united in efforts to give preference to shipments of this kind. In fact they went so far as to enter into a gentleman's agreement whereby, so far as possible, they should expedite not only shipments of goods, but supplies for the Army and Navy, and that they should be given priority.

Mr. MEEKER. Let us look into the details as to how that shall be worked out under this bill. The railroads, as I understand it, have given notice to the cities of Minneapolis and St. Paul that they will not be able to haul the coal from the docks at Duluth across to Minneapolis and St. Paul. There is now being made an effort to move it from St. Louis up the river to these cities by barge. Suppose the barge service could not be gotten into shape. Would it require an order of the President to direct those railroads to stop their munition shipments until they could transfer that coal from Duluth for the consumption of the cities of St. Paul and Minneapolis?

Mr. DEWALT. The President would have the right and power to meet the emergency of the occasion.

Mr. MEEKER. That is all.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. I hope that the gentleman's time will be extended to cover so much of his time as I consumed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has no control of it.

Mr. ADAMSON. I have control of it that far.

Mr. DEWALT. I thank the gentleman; but, Mr. Chairman, I find this to be a safe rule in all speechmaking: When you have said what you want to say, shut up. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the House amendment to the Senate bill which is now under consideration, as I understand it, is the Senate bill in the main, with some rather important omissions. One of the omissions, and the one to which I shall call the attention of the House, is the proviso to section 1, adopted by the Senate, to the effect that nothing in the section shall be construed to repeal, modify, or affect existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes, approved October 15, 1914.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. DEWALT. Is the criticism of the gentleman directed to the fact that that has been stricken out by the House committee?

Mr. MONDELL. It is.

Mr. DEWALT. Is the gentleman informed already that by agreement that is to be included?

Mr. MONDELL. Do I understand that the speech that I am about to make has already had that effect? [Laughter.]

Mr. DEWALT. I have no doubt it would have that effect if we should listen to it all.

Mr. MONDELL. I have heard of the famous case of the coon on which one David Crockett had drawn his rifle. The coon, we are told, said to that renowned hunter and warrior that if he would withhold his fire he would come down without being shot at. [Laughter.] I was about to discuss the propriety of having an amendment placed in the bill, when I am informed by my friend that it has been suddenly—and it must have been suddenly—agreed that the amendment should go into the bill.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. The facts are that the bill was considered in the committee, and the committee by a majority voted to strike out the entire Senate bill and substitute the entire House bill, which did not contain that provision, and then I gave notice that I should move to amend the bill in the House and place in the House bill the same language in that respect as it was in the Senate. It was stated in the House committee that there would be no attempt whatever to prevent that being done. Then I did what I suppose the gentleman from Wyoming does—I got busy and I found that there would be no opposition to the motion to replace the provision, especially after it had been put in in the Senate.

Mr. MONDELL. I am glad to hear the gentleman's statement that there would be no opposition——

Mr. SIMS. I mean on the part of the committee——

Mr. MONDELL. And particularly in view of the fact that the gentleman who first, and but a few moments ago, addressed the Committee of the Whole on behalf of the committee which reported the bill, and who has charge of the bill in the absence of the chairman, the gentleman who reported the bill, in his speech made quite a considerable argument against the necessity and the advisability of having such an amendment in the bill. Furthermore in the report on the bill there is quite an extended argument against the amendment, so it certainly is news that the amendment I rose to propose would be accepted by the members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. I am glad of it.

Well, the coon having come down, perhaps I should not draw my trusty rifle and proceed to fire [laughter]; but, having a few thoughts in my mind relative to this matter, I think that perhaps it will be just as well for me to go on and utter them.

Mr. SIMS. It was not my purpose to dissuade the gentleman from making his speech.

Mr. MONDELL. I know my friend would not want me to leave the floor under any circumstances.

Mr. SIMS. That is right.

Mr. MONDELL. I realize and I admit that it may be claimed that a fair interpretation of this legislation would not necessitate the amendment which the Senate put into the bill which was stricken out and which we are now insisting shall be restored.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. Is not the gentleman hazarding a little? He might convince the committee to change its mind and send the coon back up. [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. Possibly so. We shall have to take that chance. There are other matters that control besides what might be said to be a logical interpretation. Interpretations are not always logical. Interpretations sometimes go very far from the mark in the opinion of my friend from Nebraska and myself, and it is for the purpose of preventing an interpretation which might be harmful that we feel that this provision should go into the bill. And I want to give briefly my reason for the fear that there might be such an interpretation.

Let us go back a little, to the time last summer when the President of the United States presented a message to Congress relative to the then critical railway situation, a strike being threatened, so it was stated. At that time the President proposed legislation which he divided into six sections. The Adamson bill was the outcome of the President's recommendation. The Adamson bill only touched the fringe of the President's recommendations. It left at least four of his recommendations for future disposition, as the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] told us. But the President did not change his mind in regard to these four other matters. In fact, he again addressed the Congress on December 5 last, and he reiterated his recommendation for certain legislation affecting the Interstate Commerce Commission and railways and their employees.

The sixth of the President's recommendations of last December was for legislation placing in the hands of the Executive the power, in case of military necessity, to take control of the railroads, all or part of them, with authority to draft into the military service of the United States such train crews and administrative officials as the circumstances required for their safe and efficient operation.

Now, there are some of us who believe that it may be necessary in time of war to take over the railroads and operate them by the Government, who have approved legislation to that effect, and who think that conditions might arise under which that would be necessary, but who do not believe that kind of authority should be linked with authority to apply conscription to men in the operation of the train service, and who do not follow the Chief Executive in that recommendation.

If it is within the power of Congress to authorize the conscripting of men for military service—and I believe it is, although I opposed it as a matter of policy, and only accepted it after the Congress had decided that that was the wise and necessary thing to do—assuming that Congress has that authority, which I believe it has, whether or not it may be wise to exercise it being another question, I think it follows that Congress in time of war and as a matter of absolute national necessity would have the authority, in conscripting for Federal service, to put men on trains. But that is not the proposition in question, and some gentlemen get the matter much confused. It is one thing to take over a railroad and place men on the road to operate it. It is quite another thing to say that if men strike because of the unsatisfactory conditions surrounding their service you may thereupon hold those men in that service from which they have voluntarily withdrawn by conscripting them into such service. The two things are as wide apart as the poles. One is a matter of exercising those powers that reside in the Federal Government to perpetuate itself by compelling service when necessary for the salvation of the Nation.

The other is a proposition to compel men to serve involuntarily, when they have declared that the conditions of the service are unsatisfactory to them, and that they propose to assert their right to separate themselves from that service.

Now, in these times of war and stress, when we are all willing to go to the limit in placing in the hands of the Federal Government and of the executive authorities the power to utilize the resources and the man power of the country in the best way possible for the successful prosecution of the war, let us not, under stress of these conditions, get confused and bring ourselves into agreement with legislation that under the color and cover and pretense of a successful prosecution of the war really proposes to establish a form of involuntary servitude. That is exactly what the last sentence of the sixth proposition of the President means. I see one of my friends smile, but there can be no other interpretation of it possible, and it is not a light matter. It is a tremendously serious and important matter. If the administration had not gone on record in favor of this proposition of compelling train crews on strike to serve against their will under certain circumstances and conditions, then I would have said that in all probability it would not be necessary to place in this legislation a provision which makes it clear that what we are proposing shall not deprive the railway employees of the benefits which we intended to confer upon them in the passage of the Clayton Act. [Applause.]

It is because of what has been proposed and approved in the recommendations of the President to which I have referred that makes it necessary in legislation such as we have before us to make it clear we are not approving such recommendations or legislating on them. With this amendment I am heartily in favor of the bill. It confers great and far-reaching authority but I believe it necessary to do that in order to give the administration power to properly handle the situation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS].

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, a short time ago we had an interesting discussion here about extending remarks in the RECORD, a great deal of which I approve of. Now that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] has left the Chamber, I ask to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of aeronautics.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of aeroplanes. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Reserving the right to object, on behalf of the gentleman from Massachusetts, I ask the gentleman from New York if the remarks he intends to extend are his own remarks—if they are observations that he hammered out himself?

Mr. HICKS. I want to say that my remarks on aeronautics are my own.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Reserving the right to object, on yesterday we had a lengthy discussion on the plans of this Government. Is it the purpose of the gentleman from New York to further expose the hand of the United States in this war by telling to the enemy just exactly what we are going to do and how we are going to do it?

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I am surprised that my friend from Kansas should even intimate for one moment that I would expose anything that would be of benefit to the enemy. I want to say to him and to every Member of the House that never so long as I have the power of voice or expression will I utter or write anything which can be used in any way for the benefit of an enemy of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The speeches that are being made and the discussions in the newspapers can serve only one purpose and result in benefit to the enemy.

The CHAIRMAN. This discussion is all by unanimous consent. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of aeroplanes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill if it is the purpose of the gentleman to take up the bill and consider it under the five-minute rule after the general debate is over in this extremely hot day, the severest of the summer?

Mr. SIMS. I do not know what the chairman intends to do. I now yield 40 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND].

Mr. STAFFORD. I think it would be ill advised to continue the bill after 40 minutes more of general debate under the five-minute rule in this the worst day we have had this summer.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. General debate will run out at half past 5.

Mr. STAFFORD. It will not run out until nearly 6 o'clock.

Mr. SIMS. I understood it was the purpose of the chairman of the committee to proceed with the bill after general debate was closed.

The CHAIRMAN. Will gentlemen indulge the Chair for a moment. The gentleman from Tennessee has only 31 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Wisconsin 20 minutes.

Mr. SIMS. But I was authorized, Mr. Chairman, to yield to the gentleman from Missouri 40 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] used 19 minutes, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] 20 minutes, and the gentleman from Texas 5 minutes, which leaves 31 minutes on that side.

Mr. BORLAND. That is due to my yielding to those gentlemen. As I understood it there was 40 minutes to be given to me, but I will take the 31 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri will proceed.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, there is one inspiring thing about the size of this audience that I have the privilege of addressing, and that is that the Holy Writ says that "Where two or three are gathered together, the Lord is in the midst of them." And so I trust that is the case here.

I want to discuss a subject that most of you know something about, but which is such a new subject that I doubt my own powers to elucidate it. I shall endeavor, in the brief time allotted to me, to speak on the daylight-saving movement. Most of you know that there has been a widespread interest on the subject in Europe, and that it has become a subject of widespread interest in the United States. To some gentlemen it is still incomprehensible how there can be any interest at all in the subject. There are some men who still insist that the subject can be nothing more than a mere fad and a passing fancy. I hope to be able to disabuse gentlemen's minds of that idea and show that it is not only not a fad but one of the most serious progressive measures that has been considered for some time.

It was a matter of some difficulty in my mind when my attention was first drawn to it, how this matter could and should be brought within the control of the Federal Government. I conceived very early in the discussion that the chief benefit of the plan would be to make it nation wide in its operation, as it is in other countries. We are limited in this country by a system which provides for general legislation by 48 separate sovereignties.

Mr. Chairman, I ask to have read in my time the bill H. R. 2609, the daylight-savings bill, which I send to the desk, and I ask those gentlemen who are here to do me the honor of giving their attention to it, because it is a subject that has to be understood from the plan upon which it is drawn.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That, for the purpose of establishing the standard time of the United States, the territory of continental United States shall be divided into five zones in the manner hereinafter provided. The standard time of the first zone shall be based on the mean astronomical time of the seventy-fifth degree of longitude west from Greenwich; that of the second zone on the ninetieth degree; that of the third zone on the one hundred and fifth degree; that of the fourth zone on the one hundred and twentieth degree; and that of the fifth zone, which shall include only Alaska, on the one hundred and fiftieth degree. That the limits of each zone shall be defined by an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission, having regard for the convenience of commerce and the existing junction points and division points of common carriers engaged in commerce between the several States and with foreign nations, and such order may be modified from time to time.

SEC. 2. That within the respective zones created under the authority hereof the standard time of the zone shall govern the movement of all common carriers engaged in commerce between the several States or between a State and any of the Territories of the United States, or between a State or the Territory of Alaska and any of the insular possessions of the United States or any foreign country. In all statutes, orders, rules, and regulations relating to the time of performance of any act by any officer or department of the United States, whether in the legislative, executive, or judicial branches of the Government, or relating to the time within which any rights shall accrue or determine, or within which any act shall or shall not be performed by any person subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, it shall be understood and intended that the time shall be the United States standard time of the zone within which the act is to be performed.

SEC. 3. That at 2 o'clock antemeridian of the last Sunday in April of each year the standard time of each zone shall be advanced one hour, and at 2 o'clock antemeridian of the last Sunday in September in each year the standard time of each zone shall, by the retarding of one hour, be returned to the mean astronomical time of the degree of longitude governing said zone, so that between the last Sunday in April at 2 o'clock antemeridian and the last Sunday in September at 2 o'clock antemeridian in each year the standard time in each zone shall be one hour in advance of the mean astronomical time of the degree of longitude governing each zone, respectively.

SEC. 4. That the standard time of the first zone shall be known and designated as United States standard eastern time; that the second zone shall be known and designated as United States standard central time; that of the third zone shall be known and designated as United States standard mountain time; that of the fourth zone shall be known and designated as United States standard Pacific time; and that of the fifth zone shall be known and designated as United States standard Alaska time.

SEC. 5. That all acts and parts of acts in conflict herewith are hereby repealed.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I only want to say that I fully believe that that bill is constitutional, within the powers of the Federal Government, and that it will have the effect that we intend.

When the average person first hears of the project to save daylight by setting the clock one hour ahead, the impulse is to regard it as a mere fad. Some effort is necessary to elucidate to him how this result can be accomplished; that is, how daylight can actually be saved. Even after he understands how it can be done, his natural comment is, "Why should not those who want to employ more of the daylight hours of the day get up earlier and begin work sooner, if they desire to do so; and why should they insist upon making a uniform regulation for other members of the community?"

The whole project is very simple when it is once understood. It consists of setting the clock ahead one hour during the summer season, and thus advancing the business day by that period. No intelligent person has made careful study of the subject without arriving at two very definite conclusions: First, the beneficial effect of the plan, and second, that to be successful it is imperatively necessary that it should be made uniform by legislation.

The average man is wrong in both of his hasty conclusions. The plan is not a mere fad but one of the most serious proposals to increase the health and efficiency of the Nation which has been made. If we were able to calculate with any degree of accuracy the enormous saving in money which would result to the American business world, this would only be a fraction of the benefit to be derived. It is equally incorrect to assume that the method can be carried out by individual effort. It can not even be done by the effort of local communities but must be national in its scope. I might even go further and say that it has now become international, and the United States has actually found itself out of step with the civilized world by having delayed so long in the adoption of this plan.

It is a sufficient answer to the fad objection to say that laws of this character are now in force in Germany, Austria-Hungary, Holland, Denmark, Iceland, Great Britain, Norway, Italy, France, Portugal, the Australian Federation, and some of the Provinces of the Dominion of Canada; and further, that it has been urged by the United States Chamber of Commerce and a score of great business organizations in our own country.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. DYER. Is this the same bill that passed the Senate yesterday?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. DYER. What is the status of that bill upon the calendar here?

Mr. BORLAND. It has not any status on the calendar. It is pending before a committee, if it has been referred.

Mr. DYER. To what committee has it been referred?

Mr. BORLAND. I do not know. I have two bills in the House, I will say to the gentleman—one before the Committee on the Judiciary and one before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Is the law in force in the countries the gentleman has indicated?

Mr. BORLAND. It is really in force, and it has been so beneficial that it has been renewed for the season of 1917 in England, where its renewal or abandonment was subject to order in council. By an order in council it was renewed for 1917.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, in fixing the date in these countries upon which the law shall go into effect and when it shall cease, do they take the beginning of a calendar month, or do they base it on the vernal and autumnal equinoxes?

Mr. BORLAND. They take the nearest Sunday to the autumnal equinox and the nearest Sunday to the vernal equinox, except in Australia, where, of course, the season is reversed.

Mr. SLOAN. And the gentleman proposes beginning it on the 1st of the month?

Mr. BORLAND. No; the last Sunday of the month.

Mr. SLOAN. Might not some complications arise because of our various statutes in the various States? Some of our States have statutes which recognize standard time and some do not; some go by solar time.

Mr. BORLAND. I shall discuss that later. There are only about 12 States that have laws on the subject of standard time, I will say to the gentleman, and they have adopted the standard time as established by the railroads in the zone in which they happen to be.

This measure is one of the things upon which both capital and labor agree; and I quote herewith the resolution of the American Federation of Labor:

Resolved by the executive council of the American Federation of Labor, That we urge the inauguration of the daylight-saving project for the conservation of time and opportunity for greater leisure and open-air exercise for the masses of the people; and we insist that in order that the change may be beneficial it must have its general application throughout the whole United States. We will gratefully receive from and actively give to any groups the fullest support in the attainment of the daylight-saving project so long as it shall be utilized for the purposes herein declared.

As to the necessity of general legislation on the subject, it may be said that modern civilization is so complex in its character that no man can live entirely to himself, except the wilderness hunter. Every man must adapt his business and his daily vocation to the settled habits of the community. It is useless for him to attempt to regulate for himself the hours of his daily business or even his social and athletic pursuits. We have recognized this overmastering power of community action in regulating by law the hours of labor and a great many other things which are necessary to the well-being, health, and prosperity of the whole people. It is true that the man who desires to do so may arise an hour earlier in the morning and go to bed an hour earlier at night, and thus for his individual purpose achieve the result of the greater utilization of the sunlit hours of the day, but he can not in this way get the full benefit of the time which he has saved, nor can the community get the benefit of his efforts. If he is a merchant and opens his store an hour earlier than customary, he finds that the clerks have not arrived and that there are no customers on the street. If he is a professional man and gets to his office an hour before the usual opening of business, he finds that the mails are not delivered, the banks and courts are not open, clients are not about, and those with whom he would seek to do business are not to be found.

If every man undertook to be a law unto himself as to when he would begin his business, chaos would reign, and he therefore must submit to the despotic rule of custom.

Credit for the discovery of the principle of daylight saving must be given to the late William Willett, the noted scientist of England. He was accustomed to take an early morning ride in the parks of London, and conceived the idea that in the summer season, between the vernal equinox and the autumnal equinox, the sun rose from three to four hours before the usual opening of the business day. This had the effect of projecting the business day into the late afternoon and the hours of leisure and recreation into the night. In other words, a great portion of the sunlight hours of the day were actually wasted.

In casting about for some method by which this evil could be corrected, he became convinced at once that it could not be done by individual effort. There must be some way of changing simultaneously and uniformly the habits of the entire community. He hit upon the method of advancing the hands of the clock one hour during the summer months. If, therefore, the sun rose at 5 o'clock in the morning, according to Greenwich time, he proposed to advance the clock so that it would register 6 o'clock. Under this plan, as the community regulates its entire business and social life by the clock, there would be a simultaneous advance of the time of going to rest one hour. The net result, therefore, would be one more hour of darkness utilized for sleeping, one more hour of the daylight utilized for waking occupations, and one less hour of artificial light.

While Mr. Willett was extremely industrious and somewhat successful in placing his views before the British public, and while bills were introduced in Parliament each session, beginning as early as 1908, no tangible result could be accomplished until the pressure of war made the change imperative. The plan originated in England, but it was first actually adopted by Germany, where it went into force April 30, 1916. Germany was immediately followed by Austria-Hungary and Holland. In these countries the law began its operation simultaneously on April 30, 1916. Denmark followed on May 15, 1916; Great Britain on May 21, 1916; Norway on May 22, 1916; Italy on June 3, 1916; France on June 14, 1916; Portugal on June 18, 1916; and the Australian Federation on February 1, 1917. It may be noted, of course, that Australia being in the Southern Hemisphere, the seasons are reversed and the long day is during the winter months instead of during the summer months, as in the Northern Hemisphere.

The business public and wage earners of Great Britain welcome the change in the law, and after a full year's experience with it there are only two lines of business which are affected adversely in the slightest degree. One is the business of artificial lighting and the other is that of the public houses. As to the gas and electric companies, they are confronted with a shortage of fuel, congestion of transportation, and high prices of supplies, which makes them quite willing to reduce their output. The public houses complain that the hour which they lose at night on closing time is not compensated in their line of business by the hour gained in the morning. With these two exceptions, according to the report of the British commission, the beneficial results have been universal.

Among the many advantages are the reduction of the amount of artificial lighting with an enormous saving of public and private expense; a reduction of the consumption of coal for light and power, and the consequent relief upon the congestion of transportation; an increase of efficiency in the productive power of the nation; a lessening of eye strain; an increase of outdoor life, with enlarged opportunities for athletics, for home gardening, for walking, driving, and motoring, for military training, and for the use of public parks and playgrounds; a general improvement in sanitation and health; a greater participation by citizens in public affairs, and a reduced expenditure for indoor amusements. The indirect effect upon public morals has been noticeable. Wholesome outdoor life has taken the place of artificial indoor life.

All the reasons which made the adoption of the plan imperative in England makes it equally necessary in the United States. We are at war with Germany, the same highly organized and scientifically efficient country which first adopted this plan, and it is imperative that we bring the American business machine and the American human machine to the highest point of efficiency. We can well follow the course found necessary by our allies and do so promptly. But we have one added reason of great weight. By the adoption of the daylight-saving plan by the great continental countries of Europe we find ourselves completely out of step with the civilized world. During the summer months our standard of time is different from theirs, and this causes great derangement in our exchanges, in our shipping, and in our export interests. We have grown to be such a great commercial and financial power in this great crisis of the world's history that instead of lagging behind and being out of step, we should rather be in the forefront of commercial progress.

In adapting this plan to our own country two difficulties present themselves, which were not presented in England. The first is that our National Government is one of restricted powers, and all subjects of general legislation are committed to the 48 separate States. Yet this particular subject of daylight saving is one which could not be regulated by each State, but must be done, if at all, upon a nation-wide plan. The second difficulty which presents itself is the wide extent of our country, which makes it impossible to have one standard available for all sections. In Great Britain the meridian of Greenwich may be followed by all portions of the country, but in the United States there is no one standard which would be available for 3,000 miles of territory.

In the bill, which I drew with some care and introduced in the House of Representatives—H. R. 2609—I believe I have successfully solved both of these problems. The business life of the community is dependent in the last analysis upon the movement of the trains. The movement of the trains is interstate commerce and within the powers of the Federal Government. The standard of time which we enjoy now is the result of joint action by the railroads, but convenience and necessity compel its use by all members of the community. The movement of trains controls the opening and closing of the mails, and thus indirectly the opening and closing of the banks, courts, and exchanges. Around these the business life of the community revolves. In the larger centers of transportation the movement of the trains also controls the arrival and departure of the vast army of employees who reside in the suburbs, and the same method directs the arrival and departure of the great army of suburban customers, clients, and others who do business with the professional and mercantile elements of the city.

To control the movement of the trains is ultimately to regulate on uniform basis all the activities of the community in a business way, and the gentle pressure of habit and convenience brings about a similar effect upon the social affairs and leisure hours of its members. The present system of standard time in use in this country was adopted by the American Association of Railroad Managers in 1883. Up to that time each railroad had had a time system of its own, which was not the sun time of the local points upon its road. Most of the older people remember the inconvenience which used to result from the dual system of railroad time and sun time. After the railroads had adopted the standard time for the movement of trains, the pressure of convenience brought about its general adoption by the rest of the community.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. ESCH. Is there any considerable country whose territory extends beyond 15° of longitude that has adopted the daylight-saving plan?

Mr. BORLAND. I should say, without knowing the fact, that the Australian confederation must be such a country.

Mr. ESCH. Yes; but the States of Australia separately adopted it, and they have very little interstate commerce. The relevancy of the question is this: The United States extends over some 75° of longitude, having a difference of five hours in time. That would mean five zones?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. ESCH. And in railroad transportation, then, twice each year there would have to be a change in the schedule time of trains. Is not there danger that on railroads that are operated by train schedules and not by the block system that errors may be made by engineers? That is one difficulty that occurs to me.

Mr. BORLAND. Let me say this to the gentleman—I think I have caught his question: My bill simply adopts the railroad zone standard zone time now.

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. So that there is no change in that respect in making the railroad standard time the national standard time.

Mr. ESCH. But that makes changes each year.

Mr. BORLAND. This bill makes but two changes each year; that is, the change is made at 2 o'clock Sunday morning at a time when the traffic of all kinds is at its lowest point. It is true that some local and possibly some through trains would be on the road at 2 o'clock in the morning, but the traffic is so small and there is such a complete absence of all possible complications in adjusting those few trains to the change that I find, in discussing the matter with railroad men, that there is no difficulty in that respect. It would be as perfectly feasible for them to change under that system as it is now. When a train gets to Pittsburgh it pulls in on eastern time and pulls out on central time. That is all the change that occurs. The slight inconvenience to the railroads in adjusting the schedules of a few trains is more than offset by the advantage of having more of their train service in daylight hours. The railroads, in common with other businesses, welcome the change, which increases the hours of daylight employed and decreases the hours of darkness employed.

As I was saying, I think only 12 of the 48 States have any legislation on the subject of time, and in these exceptional cases the law has simply adopted the local standard time as the legal time of that State.

For standard time the railroads found it necessary to divide the country into four zones approximating one hour so that the change of time between different localities should be on the even hour. This enables us to solve the second difficulty, and I have provided in my bill for the adoption by the Federal Government of the present zone system of standard time introduced by the railroads and now in common use. The limits of these zones which are now fixed by agreement between the railroad lines is to be fixed hereafter by order of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Upon the national standard time thus created we base the change of one hour during the period of the summer months. The change goes into effect on the last Sunday in April, at 2 o'clock that morning, being the hour at which traffic of all kinds is at the lowest ebb.

Some old-fashioned people may regard the hands of the clock as too sacred to be tampered with, or some may say that we are simply introducing a fiction by assuming that it is 6 o'clock when it is not in fact 6 o'clock. Both of these objections may be answered by pointing to the fact that we do not now have true time, but use a wholly artificial and customary standard, which in some places is nearly the true time and in some places is quite far removed from it. There is not a community in the United States to-day which follows the true time. We all follow an artificial approximation established for the convenience of the community.

In arriving at the standard time of the United States we reckon west from the meridian of Greenwich, allowing a difference of one hour from the mean standard astronomical time for every 15° of longitude. The mean astronomical time at the meridian of Greenwich is the average time at which the sun crosses that meridian throughout the year, and hence is not the exact time on any one day in the year. Therefore, to reckon west according to the arbitrary difference from a purely arbitrary standard and then to apply that in zones adjusted to the change of one hour shows very clearly that we are to-day making the clock serve our own purpose rather than attempting to follow the true standard of the clock.

This plan is strictly a war measure and its use will become an imperative need in our country during the present conflict as it has become an imperative need in the warring nations of Europe. Among the great resources of our country and our stock of national assets we must not fail to reckon the hours of sunlight and the bright summer skies with which Providence has endowed our fortunate land. England felt the need of this measure, and yet, owing to her more northern latitude, the summer days are longer in England than they are in most of our own States. Heaven gives us better light than we can ever provide for ourselves at any price, and we are wasting a part of our national heritage by failing to use both for pleasure and profit all of the available sunlit hours of the day.

This is not only a great advantage to athletic, to health, and to social enjoyment, but it is the greatest conservation measure which has been adopted. I wish I had here at my tongue's end—I have it somewhere—the figures as to the saving of artificial light in Paris in one year since the adoption of this plan. The saving of the cost of coal involved by one year of this plan, the relief of the strain upon transportation and loading and unloading facilities for one year, was great also in London. The lessening of the use of the public houses in England followed by the enlargement of the day into one more hour of sunlight, because that hour of sunlight is very seldom employed in the public house. It is the hour of darkness, usually the recreation hour, which is spent in the public house. The saving in expense runs to an enormous figure, and yet it is not the principal item of saving resulting from this bill. The saving of human efficiency, the saving of eye strain, is a great thing. The owner of a great factory in this country, Mr. Colgate, put it in operation in his factory, and he says the saving in efficiency has made it so necessary that his employees have petitioned him to put it back in operation again this year. He tried it simply as a plan of his own.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman desire some further time?

Mr. BORLAND. I would like three or four minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Illinois that the House by order closed the time, and it is not competent for the committee to extend it.

Mr. ESCH. I will yield the gentleman two minutes of my time.

Mr. CANNON. I wish he would yield him three; I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. ESCH. I will make it three minutes then.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. I will yield.

Mr. CANNON. In point of fact, now, there is a difference between Chicago and Pittsburgh of an hour?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Now, in that zone is the business and the habits of the people adjusted to that hour from Pittsburgh to Chicago and from Pittsburgh to the Atlantic Ocean?

Mr. BORLAND. From Pittsburgh to Dodge City, Kans.

Mr. CANNON. From Pittsburgh to Dodge City, Kans.

Mr. BORLAND. The habits of the people are all adjusted to one standard of the clock and when you get to Dodge City it is nearly an hour late.

That is true all over the country.

Mr. CANNON. It is adjusted now, is it?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Now, this makes no change in that, but by advancing the clock one hour the whole business customs of the community are advanced by that one hour. You have traded one hour of darkness at the end of the day for one hour at the beginning of the day, but your habits move along just the same.

Take the question of recreation for wage earners. Take the great national game of baseball, and those people are among the advocates of daylight saving. Now, if the game is called at 3.30 in the afternoon, a man must leave his business or be excused from his work, if an average wage earner, before he can go. But if the clock registers 4.30 when the sun would be 3.30, it would be possible to conclude the game before nightfall. This is true of home gardening; it is true of military training; it is true of everything in the outdoor life of the United States. As I say, an experience of a year and a half in England has demonstrated that there are only two businesses that have not gained materially by this change, and one is the business of artificial lighting and the other the business of keeping public houses.

Mr. SLOAN. How would this operate on general debate, as well as on other interesting amusements?

Mr. BORLAND. I hope it would save some hours for general debate. We are not the best daylight savers in the world, but here is an opportunity for it. The business men of the country have become interested in this thing, but not on the ground that it is a fad. Fads do not appeal to business men. The United States Chamber of Commerce not only have indorsed this bill, but have a committee that has given out a report which has been circulated far and wide among the business interests of the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] is recognized.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I intend to occupy less than five minutes.

The day after war was declared in England the Government immediately took over the railroads of Great Britain, and a like thing happened in France. In Germany, as the Government already owned the roads, no such change was necessary. The change happened overnight. There was little to indicate to the general public that it had taken place. This was particularly true in Great Britain. The board of trade called to London the managers of the great railroad systems. They organized a board of 12 managers under the board of trade, and through these 12 managers the Government continued the management of the roads of Great Britain. There was no friction. In payment for taking over the roads by the Government the Government agreed to pay the roads an average return based upon the return of the receipts for the three years preceding the opening of the war in 1914.

In this country, in anticipation by us of a state of war, in the Army appropriation bill, approved August 29 last, we inserted this clause granting power to the President:

> The President in time of war is empowered, through the Secretary of War, to take possession and assume control of any system or systems of transportation, or any part thereof, and to utilize the same to the exclusion, so far as may be necessary, of all other traffic thereon, for the transfer or transportation of troops, war material, and equipment, or for such other purposes connected with the emergency as may be needed or desirable.

We did not in this bill seek to exercise the power granted in that clause of the Army appropriation bill, nor did we seek to give the President anything of that power. All we have done in this bill is to leave the railroads in operation as they are now, and all we ask is that they, through proper order, shall give precedence to certain kinds of freight and classes of transportation. That is all. And for that special service they shall be paid, not consequential damages, but for the cost of the service, that cost to be determined by the Interstate Commerce Commission. That, in short, is the purpose of this bill. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, before the Clerk begins to read I want to ask unanimous consent. There is only one amendment to the Senate bill, as a substitute, and I ask that the committee amendment be treated as the original text, and the original Senate bill, stricken out, be not read.

And pending the unanimous consent I wish to say that the only contest to any part of the amendment was the desire to restore the proviso in the Senate bill. At the end of section 1 of the Senate bill is a proviso providing that this does not repeal section 6 and section 20 of the antitrust act.

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I do not think there will be any question as to considering the House amendment without the reading of the Senate bill, but I would like to inquire whether it is the purpose to proceed at this late hour to the consideration of this bill under the five-minute rule?

Mr. ADAMSON. Several gentlemen have indicated a desire that the committee rise, and I do not want to embarrass any one of them by forcing them to make the point of no quorum. They were up late last night and the night before that, and I would not have the heart to keep them here late this evening. My purpose was, as soon as the bill had been read, to move to rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the committee amendment be considered as the original text, and that the original section of the bill be stricken out and not read. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ADAMSON. I want the members of the committee to understand my statement about that proviso, that the committee is willing that it be restored in the House bill in the corresponding place where it appears in the Senate bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That section 1 of the act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as heretofore amended, be further amended by adding thereto the following.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, as there is only one amendment there, and the gentlemen pretty well understand it, or will understand it by to-morrow, I ask that the further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. MEEKER. Will not the gentleman from New York withdraw his objection?

Mr. ADAMSON. We are going soon to move to rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the request of the chairman of the committee is that the further reading of the amendment be dispensed with, but that the whole amendment is open to debate.

Mr. STAFFORD. It should be read. We have never adopted that practice here.

Mr. ADAMSON. Then, let it be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk resumed the reading, as follows:

"That on and after the approval of this act any person or persons who shall, during the war in which the United States is now engaged, knowingly and willfully, by physical force or intimidation, by threats of physical force obstruct or retard, or aid in obstructing or retarding, the orderly conduct or movement in the United States of interstate or foreign commerce, or the orderly make-up or movement or disposition of any train, or the movement or disposition of any locomotive, car, or other vehicle on any railroad or elsewhere in the United States engaged in interstate or foreign commerce shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and for every such offense shall be punishable by a fine of not exceeding $100 or by imprisonment for not exceeding six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment; and the President of the United States is hereby authorized, whenever in his judgment the public interest requires, to employ the armed forces of the United States to prevent any such obstruction or retardation of the passage of the mail, or of the orderly conduct or movement of interstate or foreign commerce in any part of the United States, or of any train, locomotive, car, or other vehicle upon any railroad or elsewhere in the United States engaged in interstate or foreign commerce——

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from New York that as he understands the amendment, the entire amendment will be read, and then it will be in order to offer an amendment to the entire section.

Mr. ADAMSON. Then it is my purpose, as soon as the Clerk completes the reading of the amendment, to move that the committee rise, leaving the whole matter open to amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading.

The Clerk read as follows:

"That during the continuance of the war in which the United States is now engaged the President is authorized, if he finds it necessary for the national defense and security, to direct that such traffic or such shipments of commodities as may be essential to the national defense and security shall have preference or priority in transportation by any common carrier by railroad, water, or otherwise. He may give these directions at and for such times as he may determine, and may modify, change, suspend, or annul them, and for any such purpose he is hereby authorized to issue orders direct, or through such person or persons as he may designate for the purpose or through the Interstate Commerce Commission. Officials of the United States, when so designated, shall receive no compensation for their services rendered hereunder. Persons not in the employ of the United States so designated shall receive such compensation as the President may fix. Suitable offices may be rented and all necessary expenses, including compensation of persons so designated, shall be paid as directed by the President out of funds which may have been or may be provided to meet expenditures for the national security and defense. And it shall be the duty of any and all the officers, agents, or employees of such carriers by railroad or water or otherwise to obey strictly and conform promptly to such orders, and failure knowingly and willfully to comply therewith, or to do or perform whatever is necessary to the prompt execution of such order, shall render such officers, agents, or employees guilty of a misdemeanor, and any such officer, agent, or employee shall, upon conviction, be fined not more than $5,000, or imprisoned not more than one year, or both, in the discretion of the court. For the transportation of persons or property in carrying out the orders and directions of the President, just and reasonable rates shall be fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission; and if the transportation be for the Government of the United States, it shall be paid for currently or monthly by the Secretary of the Treasury out of any funds not otherwise appropriated. Any carrier complying with any such order or direction for preference or priority herein authorized shall be exempt from any and all provisions in existing law imposing civil or criminal pains, penalties, obligations, or liabilities upon carriers by reason of giving preference or priority in compliance with such order or direction."

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, might I be recognized for five minutes? I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. LENROOT. Before we rise I would like to direct the attention of the chairman of the committee to lines 18, 19, and 20, on page 6, merely with a view to having the chairman of the committee in charge of the bill consider a matter that I desire to bring to his attention overnight. The language reads:

That during the continuance of the war in which the United States is now engaged the President is authorized, if he finds it necessary for the national defense and security, to direct that such traffic or such shipments of commodities as may be essential to the national defense and security shall have preference or priority in transportation—

And so forth. Now, the point that I wish to bring to the chairman's attention is this, that neither in this substitute nor in the Senate bill is the President or any administrative officer given authority to determine in the first instance what commodities are necessary for the national defense, and thus to have this priority of shipment; and the question that I would like to have the gentleman consider is whether the President should not be given express authority to make that finding in the first instance?

Mr. ADAMSON. That is what we thought we gave him when we said "when he finds it necessary."

Mr. LENROOT. The bill does not so read.

Mr. ADAMSON. I think it does.

Mr. LENROOT. When he finds that——

Mr. ADAMSON. When he finds that it is "necessary for the national defense and security, to direct that such traffic or such shipments of commodities as may be essential to the national defense and security"——

Mr. LENROOT. "Finds it necessary * * * to direct that such traffic or such shipments of commodities as may be essential to the national defense and security"——

Mr. ADAMSON. That is it.

Mr. LENROOT. The bill does not say so.

Mr. ADAMSON. I think it does, and I think I am a pretty good grammarian myself

Mr. LENROOT. Where does the gentleman find that in the bill?

Mr. ADAMSON. I will read it to you, and will give the proper accent in the right place:

That during the continuance of the war in which the United States is now engaged the President is authorized, if he finds it necessary for the national defense and security, to direct that such traffic or such shipments of commodities as may be essential to the national defense and security shall have preference or priority in transportation.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; under that language he would be given that authority to make that kind of an order, that any commodity that is necessary for the national defense shall have priority of shipment; but nowhere in the bill is he given the right to determine what commodities are necessary.

Mr. ADAMSON. Then, what I suppose the gentleman would like to insert, between lines 18 and 19, after the word "as," at the end of line 18, would be the words "in his judgment"?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; something like that. I would like to have the gentleman consider that to-night.

Mr. ADAMSON. Very well. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRISP, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (S. 2356) to amend the act to regulate commerce, as amended, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS—DIVERSION OF WATER, NIAGARA RIVER.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that after the completion of the pending bill House resolution 109, authorizing the Secretary of War to issue temporary permits for the diversion of water from the Niagara River above the Falls, shall be taken up and considered. The law authorizing the permits for the diversion of a portion of this water has expired and the law authorizing permits for the diversion of the rest of it will expire Saturday night. All of the products made from the electrical energy generated by the use of this water are used in the manufacture of articles useful in the conduct of the war. All of the electrical power that can be obtained at Niagara Falls is needed. Heavy penalties attach to the use of water the permits for which expire Saturday and it is necessary that this resolution should become law during this week.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that as soon as this bill is out of the way the joint resolution regulating the use of the water of Niagara Falls shall be in order to be taken up. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Monday next, following the reading of the Journal and the disposition of business that may be on the Speaker's table, and not to interfere with any conference reports or revenue bills, I be permitted to address the House for one hour on the subject of some of the by-products of prohibition.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will make the suggestion that the gentleman had better change that until Tuesday.

Mr. MEEKER. Very well; I will do that.

The SPEAKER. Monday is unanimous-consent day and suspension day and motion-to-discharge committees day.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I expect to-morrow or on Saturday, if we can not get these bills through to-morrow, to ask unanimous consent to adjourn over until Tuesday, and then from Tuesday until either Thursday or Friday.

The SPEAKER. Well, that will be all right.

Mr. ADAMSON. We want to be sure that the trading with the enemy bill has been finished before that.

The SPEAKER. Of course. That is the way the request is put. It is not to interfere with conference reports or revenue bills or anything of that sort.

Mr. MEEKER. For Tuesday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, do I understand that there is under consideration, on the part of the representatives of the minority and the gentleman from South Carolina, some plan to adjourn over during next week and have no business transacted?

Mr. KITCHIN. If the food-control bill should be returned to the House, we would dispose of that.

Mr. STAFFORD. No other business besides that?

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not contemplate any other business besides that.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. The trading-with-the-enemy bill, of course?

Mr. KITCHIN. I want to say to the gentleman, with respect to that, a great many Members have already gone, or will go away, and I doubt whether we have a quorum in the city now. Members have gone with the idea that we will finish up everything that we desire to finish this week and that nothing will be done next week except wait for the food-control bill to be returned, and I doubt very much whether we could finish the trading-with-the-enemy bill next week under these circumstances.

Mr. ADAMSON. If Members have done that, they have done it in the teeth of the announcement of the gentleman from North Carolina, who plainly stated that that bill had to be considered before they entered into these agreements.

The SPEAKER. What bill is the gentleman from Georgia talking about?

Mr. ADAMSON. The trading-with-the-enemy bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. Personally, I think we would be unable to take that up next week, unless we can get it in this week.

Mr. ADAMSON. We expect to get it up to-morrow. I do not think there will be much more trouble about the pending bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course, the gentleman from Georgia realizes that there is no quorum in the city.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not know whether there is a quorum in the city or not, but if nobody raises the point we can go ahead.

Mr. KITCHIN. We do not know whether there is a quorum in the city or not. Let us go ahead to-morrow and try it.

Mr. ADAMSON. I think there is a quorum here.

The SPEAKER Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER]?

There was no objection.

Mr. LONDON. I ask unanimous consent that next Tuesday, after the disposition of business on the Speaker's table and after the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER] has finished his address I may have one hour to address the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that next Tuesday, after the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER] has finished his address, he shall be permitted to address the House for not to exceed one hour. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of second-class postage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of second-class postage. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a telegram from the secretary of the Red Cross War Council in the city of Washington to Morgan County, Colo., congratulating it on being the first county to meet its apportionment of the American Red Cross war fund of $100,000,000, and the further fact that the county has subscribed almost $5,000 more than the apportionment fixed to be raised in that county.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I think the full statement that the gentleman has made will accomplish the purpose, and I object.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, June 29, 1917, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the case of Aaron L. Abbey against the United States (H. Doc. No. 220); to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a communication of the Secretary of the Navy, submitting an estimate of appropriation for rent of additional quarters for the Navy Department (H. Doc. No. 221); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, calling attention of Congress to the estimate of appropriation for an increase of force in the office of the Comptroller of the Treasury, as set forth in Senate documents Nos. 14 and 38, and House document No. 2079 (H. Doc. No. 222); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, the Committee on Pensions was discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5157) granting a pension to Ella S. Anderson, and the same was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

Also, a bill (H. R. 5283) granting a pension to John Preston; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5284) granting an increase of pension to William Pemington; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. LENROOT: A bill (H. R. 5285) granting a pension to Clarence A. Kuhn; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. LINTHICUM: A bill (H. R. 5286) granting a pension to Ella S. Anderson; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By the SPEAKER (by request): Petition of sundry citizens of San Jose, Cal., favoring prohibition as a war measure and opposing tax on liquors; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also (by request), petition of Mrs. Elizabeth Cutler Jenkins, Utah State chairman, and members of the National Woman's Party, urging a speedy and favorable report on the national suffrage amendment; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also (by request), petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Association, of Selbyville, Del., urging national prohibition as a food-conservation measure; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. BRODBECK: Papers to accompany House bill 5278, to increase the pension of Adam G. Fitzkee; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. VARE: Memorial of the National Association of Fisheries Commissioners, calling attention to the necessity of legislation regarding deposit of waste in streams; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. VOIGT: Petition of 359 farmers and others of Jefferson and Dodge Counties, Wis., calling attention to the great value of malt sprouts, brewers' and distillers' dried grains in milk production, and praying that consideration be given to this fact in the framing of legislation which may prevent their use; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. WARD: Petition of Rev. Walter W. Voight and citizens of Milton, N. Y., urging the enactment of a law to prohibit the use of foodstuffs in the production of intoxicating liquors; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, petition of Harry C. Madden and other citizens of Kingston, N. Y., favoring national prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. WINGO: Petition of Woman's Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church South of Texarkana, district conference, favoring prohibition as a war measure; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, June 29, 1917.

(Legislative day of Thursday, June 28, 1917.)

The Senate reassembled at 12 o'clock m., on the expiration of the recess.

ACCEPTANCE OF DECORATION (H. DOC. NO. 223).

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit a report by the Secretary of State, accompanied by a copy of a note from the minister of Belgium at Washington expressing the wish of his Government that Mr. Brand Whitlock, the American minister to Belgium, may be permitted to accept a decoration of the Grand Cordon of the Order of Leopold, which the King of the Belgians desires to confer as a recognition of the exceptional circumstances under which Mr. Whitlock discharged his official duties in occupied Belgium and as a testimonial of the King's gratitude to the whole American Nation.

I ask the Congress to consider whether its permission should not be granted for the acceptance of the decoration by Mr. Whitlock, as conferred for "an exceptional, extraordinary, and meritorious act," as set out by the Secretary of State.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, June 29, 1917.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The message and accompanying papers will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and printed.

CONSERVATION OF FOOD AND FUEL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4961) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, there are a number of Senators prepared to go on this morning, and I suggest the absence of a quorum in order that all may have an opportunity to be here.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Beckham	Harding	McKellar	Sherman
Borah	Hardwick	McLean	Smith, Ariz.
Brady	Hitchcock	McNary	Smith, Ga.
Brandegee	Husting	Martin	Smith, Mich.
Calder	James	Myers	Smith, S. C.
Chamberlain	Johnson, Cal.	Nelson	Smoot
Colt	Johnson, S. Dak.	New	Sutherland
Culberson	Jones, N. Mex	Norris	Thomas
Cummins	Jones, Wash	Overman	Thompson
Curtis	Kellogg	Page	Tillman
Dillingham	Kendrick	Penrose	Wadsworth
Fernald	Kenyon	Phelan	Warren
Fletcher	King	Pittman	Weeks
France	Kirby	Ransdell	Williams
Frelinghuysen	Knox	Reed	Wolcott
Gallinger	La Follette	Saulsbury
Gerry	Lodge	Shafroth
Hale	McCumber	Sheppard

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], on acount of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. HOLLIS. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] is detained from the Senate by illness.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I wish to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES], is detained from the Senate by illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, in order to ascertain, if possible, the temper of the Senate with reference to the disposition of the pending measure I ask unanimous consent that the bill and the amendments thereto be voted upon not later than 5 o'clock to-morrow afternoon.

Mr. BORAH. I object. I will state the reason. We have had a vast amount of general discussion on the bill, we have had practically no analysis of the different provisions, and if we make a unanimous-consent agreement now to vote upon it, that will be the end of the attendance upon the discussion of the measure. I should be glad to see the bill voted upon to-morrow afternoon at 5 o'clock, but I do not want to consent to an understanding which will result in practically no consideration of the specific details of the bill.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I suppose we all realize the importance of having the legislation acted upon at as early a day as is possible, and yet I have no disposition to undertake to crowd the matter and close the debate, but I wanted to ascertain how the Senate felt about it. If there is a chance to fix a time to vote within the very near future I should like to have it done.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not want to delay the passage of the bill or a quick vote upon it, but there are some very important matters in it, on one of which I, myself, spoke yesterday, which I think will require further discussion. I know there will be a great deal of discussion about it, and I am not ready at this moment to agree that a vote should be taken to-morrow. I think the Senator had better consent to let it go over for a day or two.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will not insist upon it now.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator that if the general debate continues to-day and the different items of the bill are discussed, as doubtless they will be, possibly he might get consent to-morrow morning that at 5 o'clock the vote shall be taken. I think we ought to facilitate the passage of the bill as rapidly as possible.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will state to the Senator that one or two Senators have indicated to me a desire to address themselves to the bill to-day; I do not know how many there may be; and my purpose in making the request was to ascertain if we could hasten the final disposition of the mensure. It is possible, as the Senator suggests, that by Monday or Tuesday we may be able to agree on a time when a vote may be had.

I believe the pending question is the motion to recommit the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] to recommit the bill to the committee.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. On that I ask for a vote.

Mr. REED. I ask that the question be stated to the Senate, and I ask for a division.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry?

On a division, the motion was rejected.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I tender an amendment in the nature of a substitute to the prohibition section of the pending bill, which I ask to have printed and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I now ask that the bill be read for the purpose of considering the amendments of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. I think in that way we can hasten the measure a little, taking up the amendments in their order.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, pending that motion I desire to present to the Senate certain views with regard to the bill itself. I regret that in the haste to enact this legislation the Senate has seen fit not to rerefer the bill to the committee. As I pointed out yesterday, there are two sections in it that no Member of this body can really believe are constitutional. I assume that the Senate rejected the motion to recommit because it believes that it can adequately and more speedily dispose of those questions on the floor of the Senate itself, and that since the bill has already had extended committee consideration there was no need to send it back for further committee consideration. At any rate we will have to try that method of procedure when we reach these sections in their order.

Mr. President, the bill as reported by the Senate committee is infinitely better, in my judgment, from every standpoint than it was when it came from the House of Representatives, and yet the room for improvement was so vast that I will not say that that is necessarily a very high compliment that I pay either the committee or the bill as reported by it.

Mr. President, it may be contended here and elsewhere that the real necessity for this bill is a war necessity, but such in point of fact is not true; such in point of fact is not the case. No one of us need to be hesitant about avowing the truth on this question. The real purpose of the bill, the real excuse for it, the real reason for it, in my judgment, is not a war necessity, even indirect or remote, but what Congress has come to believe is a necessity for relieving the consuming public, especially in our larger cities, from the constantly mounting and soaring cost of living.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. If that is the real object of the bill, it seems to me the Senator finds quite an obstacle in the way in the proviso upon page 7. This is a part of section 5, which might be termed the primal part.

SEC. 5. That, from time to time, whenever the President shall find it essential to license the importation, exportation, manufacture, storage, mining, or distribution of any necessaries, constituting a part of commerce with foreign countries, or among the several States, including the several Territories and the District of Columbia, in order to carry into effect any of the purposes of this act, and shall by proclamation so announce, no person shall, after a date fixed in the proclamation, engage in or carry on any such business specified therein, unless he shall secure and hold a license issued pursuant to this section.

Then it goes on to say that—

Whenever the President shall find that any storage charge, commission, profit, or practice of any licensee is unjust, or unreasonable, or discriminatory and unfair, or wasteful, and shall order such licensee, within a reasonable time fixed in the order to discontinue the same, unless such order, which shall recite the facts found, is revoked or suspended—

The party shall be guilty of an offense. But the proviso reads:

Provided, That this section shall not apply to any farmer, gardener, cooperative associations of farmers or gardeners, including live-stock farmers, or other person with respect to the products of any farm, garden, or other land owned, leased, or cultivated by him, nor to any retailer with respect to the retail business actually conducted by him, nor to any common carrier, nor shall anything in this section be construed to authorize the fixing or imposition of a duty or tax upon any article imported into or exported from the United States or any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia.

How are you going to relieve the cost of living to the consumers, the people who reside in th cities and elsewhere, if you permit the producers of the country to make an unreasonable profit by charging an unreasonable price for their products, to indulge in unfair practices, and so forth? How is this going to help the ultimate consumer at all under those circumstances? Undoubtedly if the producers—and I am interested in the producers, because I represent them in a large measure, for we have very few manufacturers in our State—but, as a practical proposition, if the producers of the country are permitted to indulge in these practices, how are you going to relieve a man in the city? Now, I am not advocating including the farmer or producer, but I am seeking to test the wisdom of the bill as drawn and to find out, if I can, how the proponents of the bill hope to accomplish their objects.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, the suggestions of the Senator from Idaho are pertinent. I did not say that I thought this bill would really do that, but I said this bill was advocated for that reason. It gets its support in the public press for that reason principally and primarily, and such of the people as favor it believe it will do that. I am inclined to agree with the Senator from Idaho in his evident belief that the bill will not do as much as is claimed. Of course I can understand why the farmers of this country were exempted. I do not hesitate to say that it is my opinion that they were exempted from this bill for political reasons, and for selfish political reasons alone.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HARDWICK. I do.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I was on the subcommittee which framed this bill, and I desire to suggest to the Senator from Georgia and to the Senator from Idaho, if the Senator from Georgia will allow me just here, that it is known, as I said yesterday afternoon on the floor of the Senate, that the farmers, the real producers of foodstuffs, scattered, as they are, all over the United States, and who are notoriously without resources, never fix the price on any staple farm product. The farmer never fixes the price of anything that he buys. It is the well-financed middleman who does that.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask the Senator from South Carolina a question?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Idaho for that purpose.

Mr. BORAH. If it is impossible for the producers to fix prices, why was it necessary studiously to exempt them from the operation of this bill?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The idea was, as the Senator will see in different places in the bill, that certain sections of the bill have granted the right to requisition, to take, in the discretion of the food controller, whoever he might be, wherever they were found, a certain aggregate of foodstuffs and to distribute them. It is necessary for a farmer in order to prosecute his business that he might under those terms have an aggregate amount of foodstuffs, more than sufficient for his own personal use, which were raised upon his farm, and in the general run of bad crops and good crops it was considered he was entitled to a certain surplus. For that reason the committee thought, as a class, the farmer had no voice in the market anyway, that we should exempt him, and not leave him under the fear that the foodstuffs which he himself made to use for himself would have to come under the general terms of this bill, when we were driving at getting hold of the men who neither sow nor reap, but who, through their vast accumulations of money, purchase at their own price and sell at their own price.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, section 5 of the bill not only covers the speculator, to whom the Senator is evidently referring, the middleman, but it covers every business man in the United States in all this vast range of business interests. It will be a universal blanket if it is enforced, covering the entire business world practically except the producer and the retailer.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Well, I am not interested right at this stage in that, though I may have something to say about it later on; but practically every other business of any size and importance is thoroughly organized with a minimum of those who control and a maximum of interests, while with the farmer exactly the reverse is true. You have got a maximum of those engaged specifically and directly in the business without any organization and practically without any resources or capital.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I am speaking by the courtesy of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK].

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to ask why the railroads are also excepted? Will the Senator explain that to the Senate? The railroads are excepted in this bill.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I think the Senator need not ask that question now, because we have already provided the machinery by which the railroads are to be regulated, which is known as the Interstate Commerce Commission, and we presume that in these war times they will do their duty, as we are trying to do ours in framing this bill.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, not only is the exemption for the farmer made in section 5, the license section, to which the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] refers, but when it comes to the hoarding section the farmer is again exempted. It is made lawful for him, through associations, combinations, or in any other way to combine and conspire, if he wants to do so, and to put the necessaries of life as high as he pleases; and if he does it, the hand of the law can not be laid on him, although it could be laid on any other person in this Republic who did so. If that is wise legislation, I do not know how to frame wise legislation. I was taught in the old school to believe that the first and foremost principle of American polity was "equal rights to all men and special privileges to none." I believe that the first and most defenseless victim of an abandonment of that policy and of a reversal of that principle will be the American farmer himself, because of his very incapacity to organize, to which the Senator from South Carolina refers, because he can not become so highly organized that he will get his share in a grab game, if we are all going into a grab game, with everybody getting all the special privileges and all the special exemptions he can. For one, although I represent a great producing and a great agricultural State, I believe that the farmers ought to be neither above nor below the law. Equal and exact justice is all they ought to either desire or expect. For one, I would not give them more or less.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I raised this question for this reason: It has been said here many times, and need not be repeated, perhaps, that we all desire to do that which will help to win the war, as the phrase is; but the question is here, whether or not this bill will help to do that. It has gone out to the world that the object and the purpose of this bill are to reduce the cost of living, to protect the great consuming public in the cities, and so forth; and I ask seriously, how are you going to accomplish that feat, how are you going to bring it about, if you leave the great basic understructure, the producers, with the absolute power to make their own charges, to hoard as they please, and to form such combinations as may enable them to control the situation? I am seeking enlightenment—how are you going to reduce the cost of living? If you say by getting the speculator, well and good. I am agreeable to that, but we have already passed a bill covering speculators.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho is undoubtedly right; and if there is any necessity upon this country either to require or to justify the passage of this bill, the exemption from its provisions of the producing classes is an inexcusable one, in my judgment. I do not believe that the producers themselves would really desire such a special privilege; but even if they did, I could not favor it.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HARDWICK. I do.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Idaho and the Senator from Georgia to what occurred yesterday. According to market reports, potatoes, as I understand, dropped about $4 a barrel.

Mr. REED. They dropped from $12 to $4 a barrel.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. They dropped from $12 to $4 a barrel—was that it?

Mr. REED. In a few days' time; yes, sir.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The Senator from Missouri calls attention to that. The point I want to make is this: Does any man here, human nature being what it is, question that if the producers of potatoes had been able to prevent it, they would have allowed the product of their soil to have dropped in that manner?

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, that is all right; that may be true; but the point is that by law we ought not to leave them to do it if they have the power to do it. If there is any necessity for this legislation, if there is any excuse for it, or if there is any justification for it——

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If the Senator from Georgia will allow me merely to carry out my thought, I desire to say, therefore, as it is evident that the farmer had nothing to do with the high prices and nothing to do with the drop in prices, it was wisdom on the part of the committee to try to put its hands upon those who did have to do with that very feature.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator from Georgia will permit me, I repeat, in another form what the Senator from South Carolina said a moment ago; that is, with the farmer and the producer in a position that he can not control prices, and so forth, all through this bill it is assumed that he can, and, therefore, he is exempted from the provisions of the proposed law. In my opinion, as broad as you make the exemption, the producers of this country can control prices; they can hoard their products; they can hold their products; and they can control prices against the market.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield.

Mr. OWEN. I wish to suggest another reason which justifies the committee's action; and that is, that in the administration of any law of this character it must be left to minor officials who might take advantage of the small man; which is not really the purpose of the bill.

Mr. HARDWICK. Of course, they might do that as to anybody else, and about anything else. The more Senators argue it the more the truth makes itself manifest. The point is, that when it looks like, speaking of this bill from the standpoint of its proponents, it is necessary to make certain sacrifices on the altar of our country, when it is presented for that reason and on that plea, the plea is immediately put up that there is one class that ought not to be required to make any sacrifice, and that class is the American farmer. I do not believe the American farmer wishes any such selfish exemption.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. Do I understand from the Senator from Georgia that he insists that the farmer should be licensed in order to carry on his farming operations?

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator from Georgia insists that nobody ought to be licensed; but that we have just as much right to license the farmer as we have any of the other business men, and just as much duty to do it.

Mr. GRONNA. If I may ask the Senator another question, does the Senator believe that the provisions of this section will permit the farmer to do anything except to hold the grain produced on his own farm? I call the Senator's attention to the language on page 7.

Mr. HARDWICK. Now, let me call the Senator's attention to the language on page 8. I am speaking now of section 6. The Senator from North Dakota must understand that, whereas it is proposed to make it unlawful for everybody else in the Republic to hoard or to combine or to conspire to put up the price of the necessities of life, it is proposed by this bill to make it perfectly lawful for farmers to do as much of it as they please through associations or otherwise.

Mr. GRONNA. If the Senator will further permit me, I undertake to say that there is no such provision in this bill, permitting any farmer or any association to buy and hoard.

Mr. HARDWICK. All right.

Mr. GRONNA. The farmer is excepted from the penalties of this section for holding his own grain, and that is as far as this provision goes.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, with all due respect to my friend from North Dakota, the provision reads:

> Provided, That this section shall not apply to any farmer, gardener, cooperative associations of farmers or gardeners, including live-stock farmers.

Mr. GRONNA. I suggest that the Senator read further.

Mr. BORAH. Very well. It proceeds:

> Or other person with respect to the products of any farm, garden, or other land owned, leased or cultivated by him.

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. "Cultivated by him." That is, if there was an association consisting of 10,000 farmers, or an association covering an entire State, it would include everything that was raised in that entire State. All this illustrates how essential that we ourselves study this bill and not take too much for granted. Now, if I had my way, I would simply deal with the food speculator, eliminate him, and then let the laws of supply and demand operate, as they will anyway. I doubt the wisdom of this licensing system.

Mr. HARDWICK. Not only that, but, if the Senator will permit me, he has quoted from the licensing section only. The farmers are exempted under the licensing section. Then we come along and we make—although, as I hope to be able to demonstrate to Senators, it is absolutely unnecessary to do so in view of the existing statutes—a new hoarding section, and in it we say—and I invite the especial attention of the Senator from North Dakota to that part of this provision, quoting from line 18, section 6, on page 7—

> SEC. 6. That necessaries shall be deemed to be hoarded within the meaning of this act when either (a) held, contracted for, or arranged for by any manufacturer, wholesaler, retailer, or other dealer in a quantity in excess of the reasonable requirements of his business—> for use or sale by him for a reasonable time, or reasonably required to furnish necessaries produced in surplus quantities seasonally throughout the period of scant or no production; or (b) withheld, whether by possession or under any contract or arrangement, from the market by any person for the purpose of unreasonably increasing or diminishing the price: Provided, however, That any accumulating or withholding by any farmer, gardener, cooperative associations of farmers or gardeners, including live-stock farmers, or any other person, of the products of any farm, garden, or other land owned, leased, or cultivated by him shall not be deemed to be hoarding within the meaning of this act.

In other words, although we are saying—and I am willing to go as far as any Senator on either side of the Chamber will go in saying it—that we want to crucify the malefactor who speculates in the price of the necessaries of the American people at this time, that we want to hang him or burn him, yet if that malefactor is a farmer, or even an association representing millions of farmers and covering practically the entire productive capacity of the country, it is all right, just, and reasonable. What in the poor, despised middleman, who, after all, is an American citizen, with the same fundamental rights and liberties as either the producer or the consumer, and who, to some extent at least, is a consumer, although he may not be a producer—we say that what is made a crime, a capital offense, a hanging crime in the one shall not be a crime at all in the other, but something which is not only permitted but invited by the law itself. Why the distinction? What is the difference?

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I am afraid that this bill is going to be disappointing in its results. However, I shall support it; but in legislating upon this question, or on any other question, we must draw information from the experience of mankind. Now, it is a well-known fact that the agriculturists of this country for over a hundred years, notwithstanding the efforts they have made, have never succeeded in controlling the market by combination. They have produced their goods and sold them in a market controlled by the inexorable law of supply and demand. As was suggested by the able Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] a moment ago, if we do not protect the farmer against the little fellow who may be called upon to execute this law, there is a likelihood of a restraining hand being put upon him.

Mr. HARDWICK. Just a minute, if the Senator please. That same thing is true about every other American business that is subjected to this law.

Mr. VARDAMAN. As a matter of fact, if we are to judge the future by the past, we have nothing whatever to fear from the farmer doing that of which the Senator is apprehensive.

Mr. HARDWICK. Oh, no; not that at all.

Now, Mr. President, if I may carry on my own argument for just a moment. I do not want to be misunderstood. I do not want to do this to the American farmer. I am opposed to this bill, but if I were for it I would have the courage of my convictions. If I were for it I would go honestly to the position where it leads.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I expect to vote for this bill, but I am not going to vote for it because I am afraid of anybody. I am not going to vote for it because I think it is popular, nor would I be deterred from voting for it if it were unpopular. I am going to vote for it because I hope that by the organization which Mr. Hoover expects to be able to effect, by voluntary cooperation among the housewives and the people of this country generally, together with the power that is given therein, to destroy or exterminate the speculator, the men who form combinations for the purpose of enhancing the value of the necessaries of life. It is my deliberate judgment that the prevention of speculation is the chief merit of the measure.

As I said a moment ago, I have no doubt but that the bill is going to be disappointing to its friends, the people who conceived it; but I am willing to give it the benefit of the doubt and try it on, since the provision has been inserted which exempts the farmer and his products from the control of the food administrator.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. The Senators who have taken an adverse view of the suggestions which have been made by the Senator from Georgia and myself with reference to this matter seem to be under the impression that we are desirous of incorporating the farmer under the license clause. I am not in favor of it, largely for the reasons which have been stated; but what I want to know is, how you are going to control the ultimate price to the consumer if you leave the power to combine upon the part of the producers. You say they can not do the thing which we claim they may do; but you have not only exempted the farmer individually but you have exempted all combinations and associations of farmers. Now, it is useless to say that if you exempt these combinations and associations, which may include hundreds of thousands of people, they can not do precisely what it is thought ought not to be done; and that is to hoard, control, and hold their products until such time as the market suits them.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Judging the future by the past, they can not do it. They have tried. I have known them to try to combine in order to raise the price of cotton; I have known them to try to combine in order to raise the price of wheat, corn, and other agricultural products; and I have never yet known them to succeed. In all matters of legislation I submit that it is unwise to ignore the experiences of the past. Time and trial have demonstrated that there is an utter lack of cohesiveness among the farmers in the matter of cooperation for self-protection.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask one more question, then, in order to state precisely the position which I occupy?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. I had supposed when we started on this legislation that we were after just one individual, and that was the one who might, under a popular phrase, be called the speculator—the man who produces nothing, but simply deals in some one else's product. But we have gone beyond that. We have included under this bill every legitimate business man in the United States, every business man who is conducting legitimate business——

Mr. HARDWICK. Except the farmer.

Mr. BORAH. Well, except the farmer. We have not undertaken to deal merely with the man who is speculating in these products, but we say that every man, from the Atlantic to the Pacific and from the Lakes to the Gulf, may be put under a license system and his entire business supervised and controlled and regulated by some individual.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator from Idaho that not only those who are engaged in interstate commerce but those who confessedly are engaged only in intrastate commerce are placed under the supervision of the instrumentalities of this bill?

Mr. BORAH. Precisely. Just a moment, and then I will surrender the floor to the Senator from Georgia. But, Mr. President, as I view section 6, with which we are dealing, in the first place it will have a very discouraging effect upon business throughout the country as a whole. If you were dealing with this particular class of people with whom we started out to deal, it would be a different question; but when you spread out over the entire country the power to introduce the license system and say to the business people of the United States, "We will put you in a strait-jacket overnight; we will bring you under the absolute and complete control of bureaucracy in 24 hours," you are discouraging and demoralizing the business of the United States.

One reason why we exempted the farmer, as said by the able Senator from Iowa, was because we did not want to discourage production; because it would have a demoralizing effect upon the producer. I ask you, in this great emergency, if distribution is not quite as important as production? Thousands and thousands of bushels of grain rot for reasons that are connected with unsatisfactory methods of distribution; and if you are going to spread this power over the entire business world, and undertake to put them in a strait-jacket overnight, you are going to demoralize and discourage that part of the business world whose activities and initiative are necessary in this great war.

So, I say, Mr. President, that my objection is not because the farmer is left out. It is because, in my judgment, the whole system is wrong; and the very reason why you left him out is the reason why you ought to leave out the legitimate business man everywhere.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. HARDWICK. I do.

Mr. OWEN. Would it interrupt the Senator from Georgia for me to make a suggestion with regard to what I think is a defect in the bill, along the line suggested by the Senator from Idaho, namely, that there is no adequate safeguard in the administration of the bill to protect the business man against the tyranny of a petty official? I think that ought to be safeguarded in this bill before it is finally acted on.

Mr. HARDWICK. Oh, Mr. President, the trouble is that you can not do it. You never can do that when you embark on this kind of legislation. Of course, if you could do that, it would not be quite so bad. If you are going to confer all of these powers on the President you have got to let him have subordinates to exercise them. You can not escape that.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator just for one thought in that connection? I submit to the Senator that there is no danger of hoarding by the farmers of the country, for the very reason that the farmers are in violent competition with each other, not only in the communities where the products are produced but throughout the whole country. They are in competition all the while with each other, and you can not avoid that situation. There is no possibility for them to get together so as to stifle competition.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is true about a great many other business men who are included in this bill. I think the Senator is right about that; but if that is so why do you have to have these exemptions? What do you need them for? What do you want with them? Why do you write them into this bill? If they can not do it anyhow, why permit them to do it? If they can not accomplish it, why authorize them to accomplish it?

Ah, gentlemen, we are playing with words. We did not put the farmer in this bill, and we exempted him, in my honest opinion, because we dared not face him at the polls if we did——

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HARDWICK. No; I will not yield just now. I beg the Senator's pardon. That is why he is not in this bill; and in my judgment, Mr. President, the propaganda behind this bill is the most disingenuous and insincere that ever supported a bill urged in Congress in my recollection. This bill is urged as a war measure. We know that the principal reasons for its enactment are reasons almost entirely disconnected and almost wholly unrelated to the war Yet it is urged as a matter where everybody is required to submit to control and to make sacrifices for the benefit of a great country, and at the same time we exempt from the sacrifices the very greatest class of our citizens, among the most patriotic of all of our people—the American farmers.

Mr. President, I am opposed to it. I am opposed to it on principle. I am opposed to it because I believe the Constitution of the United States still lives. I am opposed to it because I am opposed to converting this American Republic, founded by Washington and by Jefferson and dedicated to individual liberty, into a great machine of state socialism.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. HARDWICK. For a question; yes.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator knows I have great respect for his opinion and his judgment.

Mr. HARDWICK. I thank the Senator.

Mr. GRONNA. I want to ask the Senator if he does not believe that under section 8 the President of the United States has the right to requisition and commandeer grain or any commodity that a farmer may have on his farm? He may go into a farmer's granary and take every bushel, and he ought to have that authority.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; to supply the Army and the Navy.

Mr. GRONNA. To supply the Army and the Navy.

Mr. HARDWICK. And let me say to the Senator, since he has invited my opinion, that if it were simply desired that the President should have that power only, you would never have had this bill pressed. You do not need this legislation to give him the power to commandeer whatever he needs for the Army and the Navy.

Mr. GRONNA. I want to say to the Senator from Georgia that I do not undertake to speak for the membership of the committee, but I believe that the members of the Agricultural Committee had this thing in mind—that if a farmer had a few bushels of grain more than he needed for his family and for seed, he should not be penalized because he did not immediately offer it on the market. Now, if the language used by the committee is not sufficient to cover that, I am sure the committee will have no objection to changing it.

Mr. HARDWICK. Why do you put in "cooperative associations" then?

Mr. GRONNA. I will tell the Senator why. That applies only to a single association. The Senator knows that in the western country there are many places where farming is being done by corporations; but you can not form an association for the purpose of buying and hoarding under the provisions of this section. This particular corporation, or any particular association, will have the same opportunity that an individual farmer will have; and that is as far as the language of this bill goes.

Mr. HARDWICK. The trouble about that is that the language means more than that, I believe, with all deference to the Senator.

Mr. GRONNA. If it does mean more, I, for one, shall be very glad to agree to an amendment.

Mr. HARDWICK. It means elevator companies, as suggested by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK]. It means the Farmers' Cooperative and Educational Union in our country, the biggest institution of its kind, I reckon, in the whole Republic.

Mr. GRONNA. I will say that it was not the intention of the committee to include any elevators.

Mr. HARDWICK. You will have to moderate your language a little, I think, unless you let all these people out, unless that is what you intended to do; but I am not after getting them in. I am opposed to putting anybody in. I am opposed to putting the American farmer in and I am opposed to putting the American business man in until there is some stronger demonstration of a real necessity for it, based on the real exigencies of the war.

In other words, while we are in war, and while I am willing to do everything in my power to promote the success of our country in that war, I do not want that situation to be made the pretext for demanding and obtaining unusual, large, and unnecessary executive powers; and for that reason I am opposed to the whole proposition presented in and by this bill.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HARDWICK. I will.

Mr. BORAH. It is on a subject that the Senator discussed yesterday. In the opinion of the Senator, why is section 4 entirely disregardful of the difference between interstate and intrastate commerce, while section 5 specifically provides that it shall not apply except to interstate commerce?

Both section 4 and section 5 are dealing with the same subject matter. That is, they are accomplishing different purposes, apparently, but they are dealing with the same subject matter. One of them entirely disregards the question of interstate and intrastate commerce, while the other very carefully protects itself in that respect. Now, if it is necessary in section 5, is there any reason why it is not also necessary in section 4?

Mr. HARDWICK. None in the world, except that I suppose the committee had some compunctions about violating the Constitution of the United States in every section of the bill.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There was a difference of opinion amongst the Senators in the committee, and I suppose I shall be violating no secrecy when I say that the entire measure is a compromise. I believe that it was not necessary to insert in section 5 anything about interstate commerce. I think the bill could have dealt with it as an individual subject without referring to the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution, but could have gone right down into the States and touched all of these articles and commodities under the war power.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask the Senator, then, if the bill would not appear in better form if section 5 were made to conform to section 4, or section 4 to section 5, one or the other?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I should like to see section 5 made to conform to section 4.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. I wish to say to the Senator from Idaho that I have intended to raise that question in an amendment which I hold in my hand. I think he is entirely right. The commerce clause ought to be in both sections or in neither. My own judgment is that it ought to be in both sections, and that would enable certain Senators to vote for the bill who favor the objects and purposes of the bill, but who are otherwise precluded by the conviction that it is unconstitutional, and, of course, they can not compromise with their convictions on that point. But if the commerce clause were invoked, and section 4 made to rest on that clause of the Constitution, that would eliminate any doubt as to its constitutionality, and I do not believe it would impair the efficiency of the legislation.

With the consent of the Senator from Georgia, I should like to have the amendment which I intend to propose read at this point.

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. GORE. I will say that there would have to be other amendments made to the section, because the mere manufacture of articles for interstate commerce could not be subjected to the commerce clause.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of New Mexico in the chair). The amendment will be read for the information of the Senate.

The SECRETARY. The amendment proposed is as follows: On page 4, line 24, change the period to a colon and insert the following:

Provided, That the foregoing acts, activities, and transactions which are hereby forbidden shall be construed to relate to such necessaries as constitute a part of commerce with foreign countries or among the several States and Territories, including the District of Columbia.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, this legislation, as I said just now, rests, so far as the popular support that is behind it is concerned, on the proposal, on the idea, on the belief that it is a remedy for the high cost of living. I think I can demonstrate before I conclude this argument that if we enact this bill the probability is—and no man can do more than prophesy on this point—that we will jump out of the frying pan into the fire, and that instead of its having a tendency to lower prices to the consumers, particularly in our great cities, it will be very fortunate indeed if this bill does not raise prices to those very people.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Before the Senator leaves the point under discussion a few minutes ago—the claim that there is danger to the country because the farmer is exempted from certain provisions of this bill—I desire to call attention to the fact that for all practical purposes, as we understand the intention of those who are to operate this bill, the effect will be that the farmer will be deprived of his world market, compelled to sell his goods in a restricted and controlled market, the purpose of the control being to keep the prices down, and that he will be compelled to buy everything he uses from those who enjoy a world market, and hence he will have to bid in competition with the world. In other words, the farmer must sell his wheat in a market which is controlled, and he is to be denied a world market in which to sell that wheat. But he is to be compelled to buy his steel from a concern that sells its steel throughout the world and consequently gets the high world price. What is true of steel is true of every article made from it. It is true of shoes. It will be true of clothing. It will be true substantially of all the farmer purchases. So the net effect of this bill, instead of being to give the farmer an advantage, is to place the farmer in a position where he is compelled to sell in a restricted and controlled market and to buy in a market where prices have been boosted by world conditions; and if it is to be enforced in that way it will mean the robbery and impoverishment of the farmers of the United States, and that will result again in the farmer's discouragement and in a failure to produce as much as he otherwise would, and in high prices then being visited upon the consumers of this city. So I think that while the Senator may be right from a legal standpoint, practically the whole danger of the bill is on the other side.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I said just now the argument for this bill rested, in the belief of some people and on the hope of many people, that it might prove somewhat of a remedy for the present distressingly high prices that prevail throughout the country. The people generally have been taught to believe that the bill is a proposal to make a criminal out of the food speculator, the food manipulator, the wicked man who traffics in the necessities of the people, and who monopolizes and hoards the food products.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] referred on yesterday to a letter written some time ago by the President of the United States to a Representative from Missouri—I think Representative BORLAND—in which the President said that certain disservice had been rendered this bill and this cause by people calling it a food-control bill, whereas the real purpose and motive of the bill was to get the control of the food out of the food speculator's hands. That was the substance of the President's letter, and it was a pretty clear statement of the basis upon which this appeal to the public to support this measure rests.

Mr. President, with all deference to the President of the United States, I take as sharp issue as language can make with him upon the accuracy and truth of that statement. Such is not the case in my judgment and in my opinion. I can prove it by statutes that we have already enacted. I can prove it by bills that are pending between the two Houses, the delay in the consideration of one of which has partially been occasioned, in my judgment, by Executive or administrative influence at least.

Is the punishment of the food speculator the major purpose of this bill? No intelligent man who reads its provisions can so plead. The real purpose, the real object of this bill, and certainly its real effect, will be to constitute a vast dictatorship over American business everywhere. I can not believe that the men who advocate and urge it are ignorant of what the effect of it is bound to be. No business in this country, great or small, agriculture, mining, manufacturing, or anything else, can, after the President's name is signed to this bill, if the two Houses of Congress approve it, live except by Executive favor, can exist except under a license issued by the President of the United States, who can control the conduct of every business in this country and prescribe the terms upon which it may exist and continue to exist. That is what the bill is, and that is what the issue is.

I assert without fear of successful contradiction that not since the days of Tiberius Cæsar was any such power ever given to a dictator, much less to the President of a supposedly free people.

Now, let us see. Is the food speculator, the food manipulator, the only "varmint" we have in this bill? If so, you need not worry any further about it; there is no need to keep the Senate here during this sultry weather to consider it; there is no need to delay in giving the people that speedy relief they are entitled to from the food speculator and the food manipulator.

Why do I say so? Is the Sherman antitrust law still in force or is that, too, gone with the Constitution? Is that a peace measure or does it operate with equal vigor in time of war as in time of peace? The Sherman antitrust measure provides:

SECTION 1. Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, is hereby declared to be illegal. Every person who shall make any such contract or engage in any such combination or conspiracy, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 2. Every person who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons, to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 3. Every contract, combination in form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce in any Territory of the United States or of the District of Columbia, or in restraint of trade or commerce between any such Territory and another, or between any such Territory or Territories and any State or States or the District of Columbia, or with foreign nations, or between the District of Columbia and any State or States or foreign nations, is hereby declared illegal. Every person who shall make any such contract or engage in any such combination or conspiracy, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

Is that still the law of the land? Are not these food manipulators guilty of combinations in restraint of trade? Why can they not be prosecuted? What have we an administration for? Why have we the Attorney General of the United States? What we need is not more law, but some enforcement of the laws we already have.

Now, again from the Clayton antitrust law. We have passed statutes enough on this question to exhaust the power of the Government on this subject already. I read from the Clayton antitrust law:

SEC. 2. That it shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce, either directly or indirectly, to discriminate in price between different purchasers of commodities, which commodities are sold for use, consumption, or resale within the United States or any Territory thereof or the District of Columbia or any insular possession or other place under the jurisdiction of the United States, where the effect of such discrimination may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce.

Again, and I will not stop to read it, although I expect to put it in the RECORD, from the act creating the so-called Federal Trade Commission, piling authority upon top of authority to prosecute, to stop, to exterminate monopoly in all forms of commerce between the several States and Territories of the United States:

The commission is hereby empowered and directed to prevent persons, partnerships, or corporations, except banks, and common carriers subject to the acts to regulate commerce, from using unfair methods of competition in commerce.

Whenever the commission shall have reason to believe that any such person, partnership, or corporation has been or is using any unfair method of competition in commerce, and if it shall appear to the commission that a proceeding by it in respect thereof would be to the interest of the public, it shall issue and serve upon such person, partnership, or corporation a complaint stating its charges in that respect, and containing a notice of a hearing upon a day and at a place therein fixed at least 30 days after the service of said complaint. The person, partnership, or corporation so complained of shall have the right to appear at the place and time so fixed and show cause why an order should not be entered by the commission requiring such person, partnership, or corporation to cease and desist from the violation of the law so charged in said complaint. Any person, partnership, or corporation may make application, and upon good cause shown may be allowed by the commission, to intervene and appear in said proceeding by counsel or in person. The testimony in any such proceeding shall be reduced to writing and filed in the office of the commission. If upon such hearing the commission shall be of the opinion that the method of competition in question is prohibited by this act, it shall make a report in writing in which it shall state its findings as to the facts, and shall issue and cause to be served on such person, partnership, or corporation an order requiring such person, partnership, or corporation to cease and desist from using such method of competition. Until a transcript of the record in such hearing shall have been filed in a circuit court of appeals of the United States, as hereinafter provided, the commission may at any time, upon such notice and in such manner as it shall deem proper, modify or set aside, in whole or in part, any report or any order made or issued by it under this section.

So I say if it is law they want to deal with the food speculator, with the food manipulator, if that is the reason, and it is the reason why they appeal for public support of this bill for that reason, then they have all the law they need, in triple measure, and what we really need is some enforcement of the law, rather than an agitation for another law that is entirely unnecessary, and the purpose and effect of which is vastly different from that, and vastly more dangerous than that.

That, of course, is all right. I will go just as far as anybody in this Chamber in an effort to exhaust the constitutional power of Congress in dealing with these food speculators. I yield in zeal to no man on that question; we have already done it; and not only that but in the so-called food-survey bill, which passed this body I believe on the first day of the present month, we included a section which strained to the breaking point the power of Congress over interstate commerce in order to confer in express words the power upon the Government to prosecute and convict these criminal food manipulators. What happened to the bill? It went to the other body with section 8 in it. Section 10 is an ample cure for every complaint that can be made that legislation is desirable and necessary in specific terms, besides the general terms of the three laws I have cited, which of course covers it. Section 10, I say, fully accomplishing that object, the bill went to the House of Representatives and the men there charged with the duty of bringing the matter to a proper parliamentary status have absolutely failed; and I am informed, although I state it only as a matter of hearsay, that they refused to even have conferees appointed unless something has been done in the last few days.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield.

Mr. KENYON. In order that we may keep the record clear, the Senator realizes that it was four weeks to-morrow since the Senate passed that bill. I should like to ask the Senator if in his long legislative experience he has ever known a bill where a conference was requested and held up as that bill has been?

Mr. HARDWICK. No; and I will tell you what else I know. I am calling no names, and I am not going to do so, but I know men high in administration circles urged that that bill be not sent to conference by the other body on the belief and for the reason that, in their opinion, there might be very serious doubt whether there would be any excuse for the passage of this bill, if that bill were passed.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator state briefly what the provisions of section 10 were?

Mr. HARDWICK. I have it here somewhere, and I am going to read it. I was not enthusiastic over it at the time of its passage and I am not yet, because I think it went further than the power of Congress goes over interstate commerce, but the Senate put it there. I did not object to it, because I saw this situation developing. I think the precise issue was not made upon it, but I thought it exceeded the power of Congress as to farm products and food necessities even before they enter into interstate commerce and before the power of Congress over it began. But at the very proper suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska in this connection, I wish to call the attention of the Senate and the country to the exact provisions of section 10:

SEC. 10. That any person carrying on or employed in commerce among the several States or with foreign nations or with or in the Territories or other possessions of the United States in any article suitable for human food, fuel, or other necessaries of life, who, either in his individual capacity or as an officer, agent, or employee of a corporation, or member of a partnership, carrying on or employed in such trade, shall store, acquire or hold, or who shall destroy or make away with any such article for the purpose of limiting the supply thereof to the public or affecting the market price thereof in such commerce, whether temporarily or otherwise, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary for not less than six months nor more than three years: Provided, That any storing or holding by any farmer, gardener, or other person of the products of any farm, garden, or other land cultivated by him, shall not be deemed to be a storing or holding within the meaning of this act.

I take issue squarely with the President's statement that the object of this legislation is "not to control the food of the country but to wrest the control of the food of the country from the food speculator." I take issue with him on the strength of the Sherman law, the provisions of which are broad enough to cover any prosecution that can be brought under this bill after we pass it. I take issue with him on the strength of the provisions of the Clayton antitrust law, that amplifies and emphasizes and if possible extends by specific terms the Sherman antitrust law. I take issue with him on the strength of the act creating the Federal Trade Commission where there is still further amplification and still further specification. I take issue with him on the strength of section 10 of the bill, which I have just read, which has been pending in the House of Representatives since the first day of this month of June, 1917, absolutely unacted upon, with the gentlemen who act for the administration in that body refusing and failing to even call it up in order to get a conference with this body on the subject of our amendments, thereby treating this body with a disregard for its rights and a lack of consideration that we are hardly entitled to expect at the hands of our legislative associates in that body.

If the food speculator and the food manipulator is the man the President is after I will strike hands with him, and my first request to him as a practical and experienced legislator would be to have him help us get our friends over there get this bill in conference, at least, so that the differences between the two Houses may be thrashed out and adjusted in conference, and we may have another law expressly directed at the food dictator or manipulator and help wrest the control of the Nation's food from his hands.

I am coming next to a brief discussion of the power of Congress, to say nothing for the moment of the policy, to enact legislation of this character. Some of the things which I intended to say to-day will not be said by me, because in my remarks on yesterday I outlined some of my views with reference to the legal questions.

Article I, section 8, clause 3, of the Constitution confers upon Congress the power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes." So far as this legislation is a regulation of commerce among the several States, it is, in my opinion, lawful and constitutional, whatever any Senator may think of its policy.

There are, however, certain other powers in the Constitution to which constant reference is made in these days as an excuse and a warrant for almost everything on this earth that can be suggested, from birth control to cremation. As to the so-called war powers, Article I, section 8, clause 11, provides that—

The Congress shall have power to declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal, and make rules concerning captures on land and water.

Article I, section 8, clause 12, provides that—

The Congress shall have power to raise and support armies, but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than two years.

Article I, section 8, clause 13, provides that—

The Congress shall have power to provide and maintain a Navy.

Article I, section 8, clause 14, provides that—

The Congress shall have power to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces.

The same article in section 15 provides that—

The Congress shall have power to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions.

The same article and section in the next clause—clause 16—provides that—

The Congress shall have power to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress.

Those are the specific grants embracing and constituting in the aggregate the war power.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. Just one moment, if the Senator please, and then I will yield to him. Article I, section 8, clause 18, provides that—

The Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States or in any department or officer thereof.

That is the power so generally and so universally relied upon by the proponents and advocates of all such radical propositions as the one now before this body.

I now yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, under the clause of the Constitution providing that "Congress shall have power to raise and support an Army and to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers," would there be any limitation upon the power of Congress to go into the States to secure the things necessary to support the Army?

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator from Idaho has anticipated the exact question that I wished next to discuss.

Mr. BORAH. Very well. The Senator says I have merely anticipated his argument, and so I will wait.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, as just suggested by the Senator from Idaho, there is not the slightest doubt that under the two powers to provide for and support an army and to make all the laws which are necessary to carry the foregoing provisions into effect Congress can go into any State, into any community, or the President could do so, and command and there requisition—of course, paying for it under other provisions and requirements of the Constitution—anything on earth that might be produced, grown, or manufactured in that State or in any other State or in any other community in this Union, to support and maintain the Army and Navy of the United States, without regard to whether it were a part of the interstate commerce or not; without regard to anything else on this earth, except that the Army or the Navy needed it for the public use and for the common defense. I have no doubt that the powers conferred in the Constitution upon our Government in that particular and in that respect are as broad and as adequate as any such powers ever conferred upon any government in the history of all time.

Mr. KING. And the Government can exercise the power of requisition in times of peace as well as in times of war.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; the Senator is right. That is not necessarily a war power. "In order to support the Army or the Navy" the Government could do those very things in peace as well as in war.

Mr. KING. In the exercise of its sovereignty.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; in times of peace as well as in times of war. There are some sections of this bill which I find no difficulty in supporting, because they are placed squarely on that proposition, and are really and truly but little more than that proposition fairly carried out; but because we have that power—because we have that broad and ample power—which is inherent in sovereignty, and necessarily inherent in all sovereignty, there is no reason whatever that we should attempt to prostitute it by a use of it that never was contemplated by the framers of the Constitution, and by an application of it that is wholly, or almost wholly, unrelated to the war or its prosecution, to the support of the Army or the Navy, or of anything reasonably connected with either or any of those objects.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, would the Senator, then, conclude that section 4, as it is written in the bill, is constitutional?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. HARDWICK. I shall answer the question of the Senator from Idaho in a moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of New Mexico in the chair). The absence of a quorum has been suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Beckham	Harding	McNary	Sheppard
Borah	Hardwick	Martin	Shields
Brady	Hollis	Nelson	Smith, Ga.
Calder	Husting	New	Smith, S. C.
Chamberlain	James	Norris	Sterling

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-three Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] presents an inquiry as to whether or not section 4 might be upheld on the ground that it is an exercise of the war power, or the war powers, of Congress to which I have just made some reference. The trouble about it is that by its very language, by its express words, considered in connection with section 1, the preamble, as it were, of this bill, which states the objects and purposes of this bill, it is not confined to supplying the Army and Navy. This bill is proposed to be enacted not only because, as stated in the first section—

> It is essential to the national security and defense, for the successful prosecution of the war, and for the support and maintenance of the Army and Navy—

But also—

> to assure an adequate supply and equitable distribution and to facilitate the movement of foods, feeds, and containers therefor, fuel, including petroleum and its products, steel and iron and their products, copper and its products, hemp, jute, and sisal and their products, lead, timber, lumber, farm implements and machinery, and fertilizers, hereafter in this act called necessaries; to prevent, locally or generally, scarcity, monopolization, hoarding, injurious speculation, or manipulations affecting such supply, distribution, and movement; and to establish and maintain governmental control of such necessaries during the war.

If the purposes and objects of this bill were confined expressly to providing for the support and maintenance of the Army and Navy of the United States, and its provisions went no further than a reasonable and adequate and proper measure to accomplish that great purpose, undoubtedly section 4 and every other section would be constitutional, no matter what it contained, unless it were in conflict with some other express provision of the Constitution on some other subject.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, while section 4 does not in express terms confine its effect to the supporting of the Army and the Navy, yet may it not be said that the entire subject matter is one which is necessary to deal with in order to support the Army and the Navy? In other words, is it not necessary to control and to regulate the entire food situation and those necessaries which are defined here in the bill, in order that the Army may be supported, because the remainder of the people must have their supply and their proportion in order that there may be an Army maintained and fed as well as the people? I am not dealing with the question of power and not a question of how we should exercise the power.

Mr. HARDWICK. It not only may be said that such is the case but that is said by the proponents of this bill and by loose constructionists everywhere. It was stated in Alexander Hamilton's time by Alexander Hamilton almost in the words that the Senator from Idaho now employs, unless my memory is inaccurate. It has been contended always by exponents of that form of thought that this power could be stretched until it covered, like a blanket, every business and every industry in this Republic, until it covered every enterprise that human ingenuity could devise and operate; but, Mr. President, surely the Senator from Idaho, surely Senators who believe in a somewhat reasonable construction of the Constitution would not say, because a remote or indirect connection of that sort might be urged or argued, that, under the guise and under the pretense of supplying the Army and the Navy, we could regulate in an incidental way every activity of American life and control every business in this Republic; and, as suggested by my friend the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], even a Congress during the Civil War that belonged to the party of loose construction, or open construction, did not give these powers any such construction as that.

Mr. BORAH. Well, I accept the Senator's proposition that it should not be a mere incidental or remote connection with the supplying of the Army; but if Congress should conclude that, in order to support the Army, it was necessary to regulate the entire situation and to prevent a scarcity which, if it should occur, might result in the breaking down of the support of the Army——

Mr. HARDWICK. Then, I agree with the Senator it would be within the power of Congress; but until that situation arises, until that situation is actually upon us, until it is so imminent that it is our duty as wise men to prepare for it and make provision for it, we can not use the power to apply to a situation that does not exist, except in the imagination of some one.

The socialists, of course, have contended for that doctrine always. Not only that, Mr. President, but it does seem to me to be true beyond all peradventure, like a proposition of mathematics, in addition or in multiplication, that we have not any more people because we are going to take half a million of them into the Army than we had before. I do not suppose they will eat any more after they wear the uniform than they did before, although they may do a little better along that line. We are not going to add to the sum total of our population by the war. Indeed, we are likely to lessen it. We can put the Government's necessities first, the Army and the Navy first, and we ought to do it, and we will do it, and every Senator knows it. But if we embark here and now on the doctrine of any such loose construction as that there will be no longer a written charter of the liberties of the people of this country; there will be no longer limitations upon the power of Congress or of the Executive; there will be no longer anything left in this country except an autocracy that is hardly less despisable than other autocracies in other hemispheres.

What will it profit us if we democratize the whole world and lose our own democracy while we are doing it? What will it profit us if we save all mankind and lose our own souls while we are doing it?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. With the conclusion of the Senator I am in agreement, but has the Senator the McCulloch case before him?

Mr. HARDWICK. McCulloch against Maryland? Not before me. I have read it a good many times.

Mr. BORAH. I know the Senator is familiar with it.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. But I was going to call attention to the rule which Marshall laid down there with reference to the construction of the powers of the Constitution; that is, that the means adopted are reasonable in view of the purposes which we desire to accomplish.

Mr. HARDWICK. Undoubtedly. I quite agree with the Senator, and of course it is a question for each Senator to determine as he comes to cast his vote.

Mr. BORAH. But if the Senator should conclude that the process developed in the bill of practically taking control of all the necessaries was reasonably a part of the entire program to maintain and support our armies, I take it from the Senator that——

Mr. HARDWICK. I would then regard it as constitutional, because undoubtedly the power must inhere in sovereignty to adopt whatever methods are necessary in order to perpetuate and maintain the government that it represents.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. KING. If the exigencies of the occasion were so great as indicated by the Senator from Idaho, would not this be the proper constitutional course to pursue, namely, for the Government—and I think it would have the power—to conscript not only men for military service but men for industrial and other service, so that all of the men, and the women and the children, for that matter, would be in the military service of the Government, though they were not all performing what might be technically denominated military service? Then the Government, in the exercise of that power, would have the right to requisition all of the property of the country for the purpose of supplying the Army and the Navy and those who are in the service of the Government.

It seems to me that that would be the exercise of the constitutional power of the Government; but I doubt, even in the exigency suggested by the Senator from Idaho, that the Government, because we are in war and because some supreme crisis should arise, could go down into the States and regulate the industries and the activities of the individuals.

Mr. GORE and Mr. BORAH addressed the Chair.

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield first to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. It ought not to be forgotten that the United States is now waging war against the doctrine of State necessity. We are now waging war against the assertion on the part of Germany that a necessity may arise which justifies the contravention of the law of nations and the rights of individuals. Now, I do not see how we can consistently contend that the doctrine of State necessity can not compel the suspension of the law of nations, and yet that it may require the suspension of the Constitution of the United States. That doctrine attaches to the mere usage and customs which have grown up among nations a higher sovereignty and a greater sanctity than is attached to the Constitution of the United States itself. I think we ought to be careful not to have a collision with ourselves and our proclaimed principles and purposes in that connection.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I do not want to be placed in the attitude of assuming that we can suspend any provision of the Constitution, nor that we can ignore any provision of the Constitution; but when the Constitution says that the Congress shall have the power to raise and support armies, and further provides that the Congress shall have power to enact all laws necessary to carry this power into effect, there is an express provision of the Constitution authorizing us to do this, and to do it in any way that the Congress thinks is right and necessary or proper.

Now, if Congress comes to the conclusion that instead of proceeding along the line suggested by the Senator from Utah it will be more effective and wise to proceed in the manner in which we are here proceeding to regulate the necessaries of life, so that there may be no unnecessary waste and destruction, would not that be within the provisions of the Constitution? Would not that be one of the proper methods; would not that be one of the necessary methods by which to support the Army, not admitting for a moment that we can suspend or disregard any provision; but is not that a fair interpretation of the provision which we find there?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I think in that connection I ought to make reference to the Topeka loan case, in which the Supreme Court of the United States held that the people have certain rights and liberties which are beyond the control of a sovereign government itself; and the court says that if it were otherwise, no matter how democratic the institution, the government would be a despotism. In the dissenting opinion in the Budd case the judges held that governments are instituted among men to secure the rights and liberties of men and not to grant or to create those rights.

It used to be the English theory, the theory embodied in Magna Charta, that the people received their rights and liberties from the government; that they were boons and blessings chartered to the people by the king. But our theory has been different—that these rights and liberties inhere in the people themselves; that they are natural rights; and that even governments have no right and under our form of government and Constitution have no authority to abrogate these fundamental, inalienable, indefeasible rights.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator entirely that what the people have written into the Constitution must stand until they rewrite it; until they amend it or modify it. We, sitting here as a Congress, are the creatures of the Constitution, and we can not disregard any provision in the Constitution. We are bound by it. If we shall find that it is an embarrassment, nevertheless we are bound by that provision. It is there. We have no power to suspend it, to disregard it, to modify it, or to amend it. The people alone can do that. But that was not the position which I took, and I do not want to be understood for a minute as contending for any such doctrine as that.

What I say is that here is a provision which the people have written into the Constitution, empowering Congress to raise and support armies, and to make any laws necessary and proper to carry that power into effect. In view of the construction which was placed upon that clause of the Constitution with reference to making any laws necessary and proper for that purpose in the McCulloch case, the question I ask is, referring to sections 4 and 5 so far as the interstate commerce matters are concerned, are they outside of the rules which are laid down there? In other words, is this a proper way in which Congress can effectuate its purpose? I am leaving out now entirely the question of policy.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator if he thinks, because the Constitution has provided that Congress shall have the power to raise armies and to pass any law necessary to raise armies, that that carries with it the power to regulate the price of fertilizer?

Mr. BORAH. Of course, the power is "to raise and support" armies. If that were stated simply by itself, as the Senator states it, my opinion is that it would be a very doubtful proposition.

Mr. REED. Suppose we put in a lot of other things along with the fertilizer—does that change the principle?

Mr. BORAH. If you put in those things which can be reasonably said to be necessary to the support of the Army, reasonably connected with that proposition, I see no reason why it should not come under that rule.

Mr. REED. Is not this the correct rule? Now, the Senator wants the correct rule, and so do I.

Mr. BORAH. That is what I am hunting for.

Mr. REED. So do we all, although there are some Senators who, I think, utterly disregard the Constitution at the present time and do not care whether it exists at all or not.

Mr. LEWIS. And I am one of those.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Illinois does not mean to say that seriously, does he?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes; I do, really. I belong to the school that thinks the Constitution, at this particular time, is more or less suspended.

Mr. REED. Very well.

Mr. LEWIS. I am a heretic——

Mr. REED. I think the Senator is franker than some other Senators, and that is the only thing that distinguishes him from some of them. He is just franker. Now, what I want to get at is this, if I may be pardoned——

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me for one moment, I merely want to say on that point, touching what the Senator from Illinois says, that it is in troublous times like these that the Constitution ought to be most cherished. We need a shield in time of war, and in strenuous times of this character more than we do in the "piping times of peace." If we should assume a hypothetical case, and assume that "the man on horseback" might one day come to be the Chief Executive of this Republic, a man of dictatorial, of domineering disposition, a man of vaulting ambition, and that we should at the same time, by any chance or mischance, have a subservient Congress, made up of drivelling sycophants, made up of fawning court favorites, made up of White House parrots—an unthinkable thing, if we may judge the future by the present—it is on occasions of that kind, it is in perilous times of that kind, should they ever come, that we need a Constitution, an inviolate Constitution, to protect us against the dictator, and to protect us against subserviency of a Congress that might be willing to lick the dust at the feet of such a dictator.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, as it is my intention to address the Senate to-morrow morning upon this subject, possibly somewhat at length, I shall not intrude myself on this colloquy to reply to my eminent friend the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma, but I suggest to him now, that whatever views I have to offer I will offer to-morrow and trust I may be favored and honored by his presence.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, just one word. I want to ask the Senator from Idaho if he does not think this is the proper construction of the clause empowering Congress to raise and support armies: That the power to raise armies, of course, carries with it the power to provide how they shall be raised, to draft the citizen if necessary; the power to support the Army means that the Congress shall have the authority to provide money and means for the support of the Army; and that there the power of Congress ends, except it becomes impractical or impossible to get that which the Army needs by the ordinary methods; and when the necessity has arisen, and not until it has arisen, the property of the citizen can be commandeered or seized. Is not that the line that is drawn in the decisions of our courts?

Mr. BORAH. I do not know that I disagree with the Senator very much; but you still get back to the proposition, Mr. President, as to what is necessary under all the circumstances.

Mr. REED. No; I think not.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. Just a moment. I do not belong to the school represented by the distinguished Senator from Illinois, who spoke a moment ago. I am a firm believer that every provision of the Constitutions obtains in war as well as in peace. The only question with me is, What is the proper construction of that very broad power which they have written into the Constitution and which applies under these circumstances to raise and support armies and to make all laws and regulations necessary for the raising and supporting of armies?

Mr. President, the men who organized the Constitution and submitted it to the people were men who had just come out of an experience with reference to military matters; and it has occurred to me that when you say that the Congress has power to raise and support armies and to pass all laws necessary for that purpose it rests largely with a conscientious Congress as to what is really necessary, always bearing in mind that you can not disregard an express provision of the Constitution.

Mr. REED. But the language that the Senator quotes, "to make all laws necessary," is not applicable alone to the raising of armies, but it is applicable to all the powers. It is not as though that had been singled out.

Mr. BORAH. Oh, no. I understand that.

Mr. REED. That expression "to pass all laws necessary," and so forth, has been many times construed, and it never has been held that that gave Congress the right to disregard facts and simply to assume the power to do as it pleased, saying, "We regard this as necessary."

Mr. BORAH. No. Of course, I understand that perfectly—that the presumption is that Congress will proceed under rules of reason as to what is necessary under the circumstances. I agree with that perfectly; but now I have before me the McCulloch case. Will the Senator permit me to read a single paragraph?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH (reading)—

> Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the Constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, and which are not prohibited—

That is one provision of this clause which is so often overlooked—

> which are not prohibited, but consist with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are constitutional.

Under that rule of construction we have here an army to raise and to support. The food supply of the world is extremely short, or supposed to be, and will be more so in the future. Is it a legitimate method under the Constitution to control and regulate the production and the use of food in order to maintain the Army?

Mr. HARDWICK. Our Army, or those of the allies?

Mr. BORAH. No; our Army.

Mr. HARDWICK. I was wondering if the Senator was going to assert that doctrine as to the armies of other powers who are fighting Germany.

Mr. BORAH. Will the Senator permit me to say a word further, and then I will not interrupt him any more?

Mr. HARDWICK. I hope the Senator will not refrain from interruption whenever he desires to interrupt me.

Mr. BORAH. I had in mind, of course, our own Army, and I do not feel that I have taken any position that is in conflict with the position the Senator from Georgia occupies. I believe that the Constitution in all its provisions controls and binds us, and the only question which is presented to the Senate, and the only one with which I am dealing in my own mind, is the extent of a fair construction of the express provisions of the Constitution.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. I was well aware of the views of the Senator from Idaho. I think he adheres to them consistently, and in the main I agree with him; but I wish to ask the Senator from Idaho this question: Taking the bill as it came to the Senate from the other House, can he think offhand of any right or liberty of the American people that is left? The Senate committee has greatly improved it, but even the Bill of Rights was not respected in the bill as it came to us. I was wondering if the Senator thinks the rights and liberties which are beyond governmental control, as the Supreme Court declared in the Topeka Loan Case, have been observed and preserved in this legislation.

Mr. BORAH. You mean as expressed in the bill?

Mr. GORE. As it came from the other House.

Mr. BORAH. I have not approved the bill as it came from the other House, neither have I approved it as it came from the committee.

Mr. GORE. I merely had curiosity to know if the Senator could think offhand of some right or some liberty that was left in operation by the bill as it came from the House.

Mr. HARDWICK. If anybody can find anything of that kind in it left by the Senate committee, I should like to have it specified.

Mr. BORAH. I do not think the Senator from Oklahoma ought to take that as a compliment for having improved the bill.

Mr. GORE. There is a great deal yet to be desired. It is not exactly like a man who left town whose neighbors said filled a long-felt want in leaving. But the House bill authorizes the commandeering of private property for private use, and I may say that that at least has been corrected.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, so far we have been discussing the constitutional power of Congress. I oppose some provisions of the bill and some that are considered among its most important provisions, first, for reasons of policy; second, for reasons of common sense; third, because these powers continually placed in the hand of the Executive have a tendency to create a despotic, autocratic authority in this Republic which ought not to exist. For one, searching my soul to its inmost depths, yielding to no Senator in his patriotic love and devotion to his country, I find it impossible not to make a sharp distinction between the country and the President. My country I am for and will support, right or wrong. The President I respect and will support when he is right, and only when he is right, according to my opinion and judgment.

This new cry, "The President can do no wrong," is hardly less odious to me and not one whit less dangerous to liberty than the old cry, "The King can do no wrong." My fathers fought to free this country from that last doctrine, and I will never bend the knee to the other. They are part and parcel of the same fundamental faith, and it will be a sad day for this country whenever the time arrives that men representing great constituencies on this floor and in the other House of Congress may not voice their dissent from whatever proposal is submitted by the Executive without subjecting themselves to a charge of lese majeste. Now, if it be treason to say these things, then I am guilty. If it be unpatriotic to feel that way, then I am unpatriotic. But somehow or other, Senators, I can not help but believe that the American people have fundamental personal liberties that neither this administration nor any other can violate with impunity and without a heavy reckoning before it is over. My earnest thought is, my earnest hope is that this administration, belonging as it does to the political party with which I am associated, may learn that lesson, may learn that autocratic authority is not to be built up in every direction and in every department, piling Pelion upon Ossa, until we have established in this country, for the professed purpose of waging war effectively against oppression, an autocracy at least as bad, or probably worse, than the one we set out to destroy. Other Senators may do as they like about it; they may embrace that view; they may embrace that theory. Other Senators may support the war on that idea. My own thought is, and I have searched the very inmost recesses of my soul to try to arrive at an honest and just conclusion about it, is that we will serve this country best in this war, that we will make for its most effectual and vigorous and successful prosecution and conclusion, if we will let the American people go to it as a race of free men and not as a race of serfs. We should let the American people prosecute it as the exponents, the proud exponents, of the great idea of individual liberty and personal freedom, and quit trying to ape the different European autocracies in the measures that we enact for the prosecution of this war.

After some study, not as careful and not as exhaustive as I would like to have made, of the legislation enacted by these other countries during this war, in England, France, and Germany particularly, I venture to make the assertion, which I challenge any Senator to successfully contradict, that we have probably gone further in three months than any one of those countries has gone in three years in this sort of business, and I ask in all calmness, in all honesty, in all fairness, of my associates in this body, if it is not time we were calling a halt and taking a survey of the situation to see if we can not find one or two little real liberties of the people it is not yet necessary to surrender on account of the war over in Europe?

Mr. GORE. As a keepsake.

Mr. HARDWICK. Let us have one at least as a memento, as a keepsake, as a remembrance of what our fathers left to the people, even if we can not transmit them to our children.

Mr. President, I ask the Secretary to read this article from the New York Sun on the subject of the concentration of autocratic powers of all sorts in the hands of the Executive.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McNARY in the chair). Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

WILSON'S POWER ROUSES CAPITOL—MEMBERS AMAZED AT EXTENT TO WHICH AUTHORITY HAS BEEN ASKED—LIKENED TO AUTOCRACY—RUMBLINGS HEARD AND OPEN CRITICISM MAY RESULT FROM PENDING BILLS.

WASHINGTON, May 26.

Vast powers, autocratic in their nature and never before possessed by the Nation's Chief Executive, are being sought in this emergency by President Wilson and are bestowed on him in the war measures passed or pending.

These powers have been demanded by the President because he deems them vitally necessary if the war is to be won. In other words, to win this war against autocracy autocratic authority reaching into the very homes of the people must be placed at the disposal of the President as the Nation's battle chief, to be used or not as he sees fit.

That is the position which Mr. Wilson has taken in the few weeks that the Nation has been at war. And Congress, recognizing the occasion as extraordinary and practically laying aside partisanship, has not thus far been disposed to take issue with him. Nevertheless, as measure after measure is being debated or passed giving the President virtually these dictatorial powers over the people, with respect to their homes, their businesses, the food they are to eat and their very status as citizens, anxious eyes are turned from the Capitol to the White House, eyes that question while lips are dumb. And the question is this: Granted such powers are necessary in this great world crisis, will they be properly administered and will the country, swinging away now from its traditional landmarks, return to them again when the war is over?

POWERS ALREADY GRANTED.

This question has been asked in the last few days by many Senators and Representatives, including members of the President's own party. A survey of some of the war measures shows why.

Powers of a dictatorial nature given to the President under measures already passed and signed or now in conference, covering various matters of public interest, including industry, agriculture, commerce, and transportation, may be stated as follows:

Under the food-administration bill: The right to control necessaries in the way of food and all the processes, methods, and activities of production, storage, distribution, sale, and consumption. This includes the right to license any business for the handling of food, the right to direct when and at what price food shall be sold, the right to take over any factory, mine, or plant producing fuel or food; the right to fix the price at which food or fuel shall be bought and sold; the right to say what kind of flour shall go into bread; and the right virtually to establish nation-wide prohibition by prohibiting the use of foodstuffs in the making of intoxicants.

MAY COMMANDEER SHIP PLANTS.

Under the naval appropriation bill: The right to commandeer for the uses of the Federal Government and as a war measure shipbuilding plants and plants manufacturing ship materials and parts of ships' engines, naval ordnance stores, naval stores, including ordnance stores, and to take over under Federal supervision private plants or parts of plants as may in his judgment seem advisable.

Under the conscription bill: The right to decide within limitations only as to age and the condition of dependency of members of the family of the conscript just which classes of men shall be selected for military service and from what walks of life and conditions of private employment such men should be called.

Under the proposed amendment to the interstate-commerce law: The right, in person or through some such person as he may designate, to direct the preferential shipment of any freight according to his own judgment of its relative importance to the public security and defense, a right which virtually would make him master of the country's transportation without actually taking possession of the railroads.

LOANS TO OTHER NATIONS.

Under the bond-issue law: The right to make loans to foreign governments in amounts based upon his personal judgment and the advice of his Secretary of the Treasury, limited only by the total amount of $3,000,000,000. The right is described by the law as follows:

"That for the purpose of more effectually providing for the national security and defense and prosecuting the war by establishing credits in the United States for foreign governments, the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, is hereby authorized on behalf of the United States to purchase at par from such foreign governments then engaged in war with the enemies of the United States their obligations hereafter issued, bearing the same rate of interest and containing in their essentials the same terms and conditions as those of the United States issued under authority of this act; to enter into such arrangements as may be necessary or desirable for establishing such credits and for purchasing such obligations of foreign governments and for the subsequent payment thereof before maturity."

Under the espionage bill: The right to control the press through authorization to proclaim from time to time advice to the press as to what classes of information regarding military and naval plans and progress may be printed. The censorship provision, however, has been redrafted daily during the past week and its terminology changed and altered in various ways.

FURTHER SHIPPING POWERS.

Under the shipping provisions of the general deficiency bill, more commonly known as the war-budget bill: The right to assume absolute control over the shipbuilding industry of the entire Nation. To take over at a price to be fixed by subsequent agreement ships in course of construction for private parties, whether they be Americans or foreigners. To take over control of all establishments wherein are manufactured parts of ships or of their materials or machinery and to assume control of parts of plants where only parts of such plants are desired to be used for Government work.

Of the measures listed above only the bond bill, the naval bill, and conscription bill have become laws. With the exception of the food bill, the other measures have been debated and passed in both Houses and are now in conference, with the prospect of their emerging as laws within the next three weeks.

Without a disposition at this time to dispute seriously necessity of investing the President with such unprecedented powers, many in Congress point out that in the very inception of these measures the country has seen a departure from old forms and traditions, for lacking in theory the power of initiative in legislation possessed by the British premier, the President in this war crisis virtually has assumed this in many cases by having the powers sought by him incorporated in bills drawn by his own administrative officers and the bills then given to the chairmen of the appropriate committees to be handed in to Congress for passage.

SENATORS ARE AMAZED.

It is at this growing practice rather than at the powers demanded that most of the criticisms publicly vented thus far have been directed.

But with regard to the larger aspects of the situation, the tendency toward autocracy as a war expedient, there are many premonitory rumblings. At some of the powers sought Senators of the conservative type in the last week, especially since the food bills were introduced, have been struck almost dumb, to use their own words.

Watching with admittedly anxious eyes the growing power of the Executive under stress of war, some Senators, while not inclined to hold up any of the pending measures, nevertheless insist that the necessity for the authority now demanded has grown out of the lack of any diligent preparation in the years during which the storm clouds were gathering. This, they insist, is particularly true with regard to the shipping and food problems. Now that lost time may be made up, these Senators insist it is necessary now virtually to subvert the Constitution.

Defenders of the President are frank to admit that some of the powers demanded are predicated on the assumption that in war the Constitution is automatically suspended. No less a constitutional lawyer than Senator KNOX declared that almost any legislation was justified by the so-called war power.

"My position is," said Senator KNOX, "that Congress, after a war has been declared, may pass any law which it believes is necessary for its preservation."

But there are many Senators who disagree violently with this contention, and who assert that the Constitution was made for war as well as peace. They point out privately that in many of the pending measures the sovereignty of the States is being invaded, that the line between intrastate and interstate commerce is being ignored, and that confiscation without due compensation is being aimed at.

"If the President," said one leading Senator to-day, "were an all-wise man and all those under him all-wise men, the autocracy toward which we are tending undoubtedly would be the most perfect form of government for this war. On such a hypothesis the powers sought for by and given to the President would be eminently proper. But however we may feel about the wisdom and discretion of the President whom we are supporting, can the same thing be said about those to whom he intends to delegate these powers? The price that will have to be paid for incompetence is enough to cause many of us to pause and ponder. And then with all going well, will the pendulum swing back again when the war is over and the socialistic Government we are producing be relinquished for that which the Constitution intended to establish?"

There are many Senators of radical tendencies who have suppressed a desire to criticize, believing it to be a patriotic duty at this time to support the President. But these Senators feel that when the efficacy of some of the new laws being made is felt by the people there will be a reaction. Some of this criticism is almost sure to find vent in the discussion of the food bill. There are rumblings on the Democratic side as loud as on the Republican side. One of these Senators pointed out to-day that the food bill represented the height of this assumption of power for domestic purposes while the embargo clause in the espionage bill marked the height of the President's new power in foreign affairs. "The President can wield a despotic power over the very existence of the people under the food bill," said this Senator, "and under the embargo clause he can with one stroke of his pen cut off all our commerce with all neutral countries. And with the censorship provision enacted into law he can shut the mouths of the people if they complain. I do not go so far as to say that they are not necessary at this time. They may be. But they represent the power of the sword, the purse, and food, and there is little left outside of these for us to delegate."

While some of these measures are sending shivers up the spines of many Democratic Senators and Representatives, their faith in the President is such that they apparently are willing to invest him with dictatorial powers, believing that he would be the last person to abuse them. In this naturally they are much more confident than their Republican associates, who are beginning to take the position that at least such grants of power, equal, as Senator LODGE has pointed out, to that exercised by the great autocracy of Germany, should receive the most careful consideration.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I had that article read to the Senate because I want the public to know practically what we have done.

Mr. WARREN. May I ask the Senator in what paper the article appeared?

Mr. HARDWICK. In the New York Sun. It is a pretty careful, and I think fairly accurate, résumé of what Congress has done in the execution of its so-called war powers, and it is just as well to know and have the people know what we have done and what we have been called upon to do.

On the same day, I think it was, possibly the next day, the same newspaper had a very fine editorial entitled "Eternal vigilance is the price of democracy, too." I wish to read this article, because I want it to go in the RECORD.

ETERNAL VIGILANCE IS THE PRICE OF DEMOCRACY, TOO.

We have not heard that the British Parliament has surrendered any of the immense powers which make it the most important legislative body in the world. Where Great Britain has found it necessary to centralize authority for the period of the war Parliament has delegated some of its powers to one or more men. Parliament could do this, because at any moment it can overthrow the ministry and force a complete reorganization of the British Government from top to bottom.

If Parliament does not like the way Mr. Lloyd-George or his associates conduct any phase of the war, Mr. Lloyd-George or his associates have no choice but to seek the nearest exit from office without delay.

Neither Mr. Lloyd-George nor his predecessors have had or can have the inherent war powers of the President of the United States; nor can the British war council pursue a policy of which a majority of the representatives of the British people disapprove.

The Congress of the United States has never possessed the powers of the British Parliament. It can not make and unmake cabinets; it can not upset the policies of the Executive; it can not force changes in the military conduct of a war.

Yet the Congress of the United States is now expected to make over unconditionally to the Executive the powers expressly conferred upon it by the Constitution on the plea that this is necessary for the success of America in the present war.

The plea is utterly fallacious. Based on the acts of the British Parliament, it ignores entirely the structural differences between our Government and the Government of the United Kingdom.

Would Parliament ever have so much as delegated its authority to a recall them instantly? Not by a long shot. But if the Congress gives food control to a man here and news control to a few men there, shipping control to some one else, and financial control to another little coterie, Congress abdicates for the duration of the war; Congress surrenders powers the Constitution says it must exercise; Congress is man here and two or three men there if it had known that it could not reduced to a group of chosen representatives of the American people who have nothing to do but sit and criticize.

But not only is Congress being called upon to hand over piecemeal to the Executive its various powers; it is expected, in the words of a Washington dispatch, to subscribe to Mr. Wilson's "method of picking men for offices and then directing the Congress of the United States"—

This is in quotation marks. I suppose it is taken from some interview that purported to come from him—to subscribe to Mr. Wilson's "method of picking men for offices and then directing the Congress of the United States to write a law around the personality of the President's particular choice for the office which Congress is by him directed to create."

What Congress should do is to enact the laws necessary for the successful conduct of the war according to its own wisdom, be that great or small. It will be infinitely better for the future of this country if both the legislative and executive departments of the Government perform their own functions and make and correct their own mistakes. That is the essence of democracy, and we shall not "make the world safe for democracy" by abandoning representative government at home.

Mr. President, on the same line I could multiply indefinitely almost expressions from some of the most thoughtful men in the Republic. I want to read some surprising language from the New York World.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Harding	McCumber	Smith, Mich.
Beckham	Hardwick	McKellar	Smith, S. C.
Borah	Hitchcock	McLean	Smoot
Brandegee	Hollis	McNary	Sterling
Calder	Husting	New	Sutherland
Chamberlain	James	Norris	Swanson
Culberson	Johnson, Cal.	Overman	Thomas
Cummins	Johnson, S. D.	Owen	Thompson
Curtis	Jones, N. Mex.	Page	Tillman
Dillingham	Jones, Wash.	Phelan	Vardaman
Fletcher	Kellogg	Poindexter	Wadsworth
France	Kendrick	Ransdell	Warren
Frelinghuysen	Kenyon	Reed	Weeks
Gallinger	King	Shafroth	Williams
Gore	Kirby	Sheppard	Wolcott
Gronna	Knox	Sherman
Hale	Lewis	Smith, Ariz.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-six Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, pursuing the same line of thought, I next want to offer to the Senate and to the country a somewhat remarkable editorial of just a few days ago from the New York World. The occasion for the World's objection to the way things are now being done is the prohibition question; but some of the observations might well be applied to many other things. This editorial is headed, "Is personal liberty to end?" Reading from it, it proceeds in this way:

Nation-wide prohibition, as it is usually urged, by constitutional amendment, is open to serious objection on the ground that, once effected, a small minority of States would forever possess the power to veto the wishes of a great majority of States to reverse a policy regretted.

In this present instance, acting chiefly under the influence of a lobby as pestiferous as any that ever appeared in Washington, the House of Representatives exercised despotic powers without excuse. At one stroke it decreed the death of a great industry, wiped out an immense property, menaced more than a million of men with nonemployment, threatened the financial systems of Nation, States, and cities, and, with Prussian disregard of personal rights, undertook by legislative fiat alone to domineer and direct the habits and customs of a free people.

Contempt of popular rights and the mischievous confusion of governmental affairs at a time when every energy should be bent upon the prosecution of the war are not the only alarming phases of this performance. More sinister than these is the palpable fact that by this legislation the House of Representatives yielded weakly and almost unanimously to a lobby maintained for the most part by organizations pretending to be religious.

I will read again from another part of the editorial:

To-day this lobby is undertaking to say what the American people shall and shall not drink. A year or a decade hence—

And much sooner than that, let me interject, if this bill should pass—

it may be regulating their diet, their clothing, their reading, their holidays, their tobacco, their amusements, their very form of worship, and all to the glory of God, as it would say.

Let no one suppose that the present contest at Washington is actually between religion and liquor. What passes as religion here is the craftiest kind of politics. It is religion misused in behalf of fanaticism and bossism. Involved in this conflict is something of more importance for the moment and for all the years to come than any issue, however sharp, between total abstinence and moderation, and that is the people's rights.

In rought political fights such as we have here to consider, which some of the well-financied buttonholers engaged in the prohibition movement like to call "moral conflicts," millions of industrious and virtuous people whose elementary liberties are assailed are never heard from.

And so it is about this bill in many other directions, I interject again:

If Congress timidly abandons its true representative functions and listens only to the voice of self-proclaimed righteousness, up to its ears in politics, and dirty politics, we are on the road to mastery such as no republic can survive.

In war—

Now, listen to the New York World:

In war, as in peace, the people's rights are paramount. The people's right to live their own orderly lives unvexed by meddlers setting up preposterous claims to superior sanctity and wisdom has never before been challenged as it is to-day in the very citadel of democracy. A Republic that is to make the world free for democracy must not be strait-jacketed. It will not be strait-jacketed.

If the time ever comes when morality in the United States must depend upon the work at Washington of a pretentious lobby, pious and paid, the Declaration and the Constitution will have been written in vain.

I commend that editorial to the Senate and to the country. It is not only applicable to the liquor question but it is applicable to almost every phase of this pending proposition. A republic that is to light the way to real democracy makes a mighty poor start if it loses about ninety-nine one-hundredths of its own democracy in getting started.

I have other objections to this bill. Before I could vote for it I should have to take my hat in hand and humbly apologize to every socialist whom I have ever known, for every single one of his propositions are adopted; and you had just as well do it if any of you have any idea of voting for it and you know any socialists. It is State socialism, pure, simple, unadulterated, and self-confessed.

I agree, in part at least, with what was said on yesterday by the distinguished senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. You can not go in the very teeth of great economic and industrial laws, you can not disregard the great fundamental principles of economics and finance and expect your legislation to survive or to amount to anything. You can violate the Constitution of the United States as much as you please and as often as your conscience will let you; there is no remedy for that, unless our Supreme Court will pluck up a little additional courage; there is no remedy for that and no redress for that except in the forum of conscience and of morals; but just as soon as you undertake to write statute laws that violate the great economic principles they will not be worth the paper on which they are written. One consolation about it is that it is utterly futile and useless to undertake it.

Before we embark on this price-fixing scheme advocated and pronounced and proposed in this bill it might be just as well for us to stop and inquire whether such a scheme as that has ever succeeded in any country on this earth. If so, what were the countries? When did it succeed? Has it succeeded in France? Although possibly one-quarter of that Republic's territory in Europe is in the hands of the invader at the moment, I do not think so. Has it succeeded in England? My information is that most of the legislation of this kind that has been proposed there has been repealed, and that all of it has failed.

This bill proposes both a maximum and a minimum price—a minimum price in express words and a maximum price under the provisions of section 5. I say to you that it will be as useless and as futile to attempt to fix a price by statute law that is different from the price fixed by economic and trade laws as it would be to try to turn the tides back or to try to reverse the motion of the earth on its axis.

What will happen? Only one thing is possible: If the price fixed is higher than the thing affected is actually worth, everybody will sell to the Government so long as the Government's money lasts, and that will be the end of it. If the price fixed is lower than the article is actually worth, nobody will pay any attention to it or sell at it. Cotton is to-day worth something like 26 cents a pound. Suppose you said by law that the price of cotton should be 15 cents a pound—and it could be done under this bill, in my judgment—do you suppose anybody would pay any attention to that, or sell any of it at that price? Cotton is worth 26 cents a pound. Suppose you say by law that the price of cotton shall be 50 cents a pound. Everybody in the South would be patriotic enough to sell to you all they have as long as your money lasted.

So I am against this bill because of the despotic, autocratic, undemocratic, and un-American powers that it confers. I am against this bill because it violates the principles of common sense, as well as the principles of democracy and freedom. I am against this bill because it flies in the very teeth of the experience of all the world.

Mr. President, I do not flatter myself with the hope that any word of mine or any argument of mine can change or alter the course of a single Member of this body. I suppose that this bill will be passed, like all the other bills that have been written for us have been passed, and without very much more delay. There is but one appeal, and that is to the great American people; and you need not doubt, Senators, but what that appeal will be made.

The American people are committed to this war; yes. They will wage the war, in my judgment, with practical unanimity, as long as a man can put up his hand or advance his foot, as long as there is a drop of human blood left in this country; they will wage it as long as we can spend a dollar on it. But let it be, Senators, an American war, to vindicate American honor, to establish American rights—just that, and nothing more. I would spend the last drop of blood in my body, and I would vote the last drop of blood in the body of every Georgia man and of every other American to wage such a war as that; but not one drop of my own blood, not one drop of Georgia's blood, not one drop of American blood would I vote to wage a war to "democratize the world," to determine what the boundary line of a single European country shall be, or what the form of government of any country in Europe shall be.

Now, let us get it down to that basis, and we will find the country united for this war; we will find everybody willing to wage it. Let us get away from all this other nonsense, and let our people know that we are fighting this war because Germany fired upon our flag and murdered our citizens upon the high seas, without either justification or excuse. Let us quit all this talk about European boundary lines and European forms of government, and we will get along a little faster and go a little further with this war, and conduct it and conclude it with a good deal more celerity and more success. There is nothing in this bill that the war makes necessary. It offends my democracy; it offends my Americanism; and I can not and will not support it.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, I desire to discuss briefly the merits of the pending bill. In the interest of time and orderly procedure, I would prefer not to be interrupted until the close of my remarks, when I will be glad to answer any questions Senators may desire to ask.

Through no fault of our own we are at war with Germany. We are at war in spite of every effort this Government made to avoid war. We adopted every honorable means known to friendship and patience to prevent war, but without avail. Nothing was left undone, without surrendering sacred rights, honor, and sovereignty, by this Government to prevent war.

The case of the American people can rest upon no higher plane than that on which it was placed by President Wilson at various times in discussing the issues of the war, and his statement of the reasons for the war is no less admirable than his statement of the methods and means necessary to prosecute it to success. So far as the United States is concerned, the principal object now is to compel an honorable and lasting peace; and to do so we must employ to the best advantage all financial, military, and economic resources of this country to crush German autocracy and the Kaiser's bigoted ambition to rule the world.

The bill proposed is strictly a war measure and is expressly so limited by its terms. Germany is the most autocratic and thoroughly organized military nation in the world. She has spent over half a century in building up a military machine and organizing her industries and Government to control that machine to the highest point of perfection. This is a contest between German autocracy and the democracy of the world, and it can only be settled by the character and strength of the organization which our country can throw into this mighty conflict. Germany is thoroughly organized, ready, experienced, and seasoned for the contest. America must become even more efficient. What every loyal American citizen wants now is success. America has succeeded in every war she has waged, even against great odds, and she will succeed in this, no matter how long it may take or how much it may cost.

There were three principal tasks that faced peace-loving America when the clouds of war shed their rain upon us. Three things were necessary for success: First, we needed men; second, money; and third, food. We needed a large number of men to save the honor of the world; we needed a great amount of money to carry the strong arm of right to victory; and we needed food conservation and control to feed our armies as well as those of our allies.

By a quick and ready response of the country, we have demonstrated that we have the men ready and willing to serve, 20,000,000 strong if necessary. In a few weeks we have 2,000,000 men fast on the way to proper training and organization and have already one division safely landed in France. We have also demonstrated that we have the money by providing for the greatest war fund ever created at one time by any legislative body in the world—$7,000,000,000—in the very outset of the war. The heavy oversubscription to the liberty-bond issue shows the spirit of sacrifice and willingness of the people to furnish the necessary money. The quick response of the people in voluntarily contributing over $100,000,000 within a week for the Red Cross work, demonstrates more emphatically the true spirit of patriotic sacrifice which animates the American people.

The third proposition, providing the necessary food, is not so easily assured, for it depends upon so many things, some of which man can not control—the soil, sunshine, and rain, and proper cultivation—to bring about production, and then, even after produced, every means possible must be taken to prevent loss in distribution. So in dealing with this third and most important proposition we must look after the best methods of production, transportation, conservation, and distribution of food products to bring about the greatest measure of supply. While we always raise more than enough food for ourselves in ordinary times, yet now we must feed not only ourselves but the soldiers at the front, as well as our allies, many of whom are in a starving condition. There are about 45,000,000 of people in the British Isles, 40,000,000 in France, 36,000,000 in Italy, and 9,000,000 in Belgium, making a total population of about 130,000,000 of allied people alone whom we must furnish the greater part of their foodstuffs, which practically doubles our food requirements. So, after all, the food problem is the greatest problem of the war, and how to solve it is just as important as the question of how to raise the Army and the necessary money for its equipment. Congress almost unanimously voted to raise the necessary men and the required amount of money without much discussion or controversy. That Congress should now even hesitate to make proper provision for furnishing the greatest supply of food, without which the war will be a failure, is difficult to understand.

There is one thing certain, and that is the people of the country are demanding that something shall be done, and done quickly. There was some difference in opinion among the people as to the necessity for raising the Army by conscription and as to the necessity for the large amount of money provided, but there is no difference of opinion among them as to the necessity for providing for food, which the people themselves must have at home as well as our soldiers at the front and our allies. I know of no measure which has been before Congress that meets with such unanimity of opinion as the absolute necessity for food control during this war. The almost unanimous vote of the House on this bill—365 for to only 5 against—forcibly reflects the favorable sentiment of the whole country toward the bill. As further evidence of this sentiment, I want to read a number of letters which I have received from my constituents residing in various sections of the State. While I have received hundreds of letters and telegrams favorable to the bill, and very few against it, yet I have selected only a few from different parts of the State in order to show that this sentiment is general and that the people know what they are talking about and are in dead earnest and fully appreciate the desperateness of the situation.

I have just this morning received a petition signed by a hundred or more people from the city of Topeka, the home city of my distinguished colleague [Mr. CURTIS]. The petition is signed by the business men of that city, headed by R. C. McGregor, and public officials, including the mayor of the city as well as the governor of the State, and is as follows:

TOPEKA, KANS., June 26, 1917.

Hon. WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. THOMPSON: There is an intense and general desire and need for the benefit of food regulation.

A grave danger confronts the American people, the danger of hunger, which will portend greater injury than the threats of our foreign foe. Food speculators are again busy gambling on the peoples' necessities.

By the fact that bread is cheaper in Belgium, France, and Italy than it is in our own country, also that we ship grain to Belgium from which their lower-priced bread is made, it is my desire to have food administration made effective.

We sincerely ask that you do all in your power to vote to pass the Lever food-administration bill.

Thanking you—

And so forth.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMPSON. I stated at the outset that I would prefer not to be interrupted.

Mr. REED. Very well.

Mr. THOMPSON. I shall be glad to answer any questions at the close of my remarks.

Mr. REED. My question will not be apropos then. I simply wanted to ask the Senator if he believed the statement of fact contained in that telegram to be accurate?

Mr. THOMPSON. I think it is fairly accurate, from the testimony that has been introduced before the committees and the argument that has been made here; but I should prefer to proceed, and I shall be glad to answer any question the Senator may want to ask when I am through.

Mr. REED. Very well. I will not interrupt the Senator. I beg his pardon.

Mr. THOMPSON. I simply did not want to get into a controversy with the Senator as to what the evidence might have been on these different questions.

Mr. REED. Very well.

Mr. THOMPSON. I have here a letter from the manager of the Kansas Farmer, the leading farm paper of the State, which has a circulation among the farmers of about 70,000. The letter is of recent date, June 25, 1917, and fairly represents the views of the farmers, addressed to me, and states:

I hope that you will lend every assistance possible toward the speedy enactment of the food-administration bill now before the Senate. The food bill has taken preeminence at present out here even over the war itself, because the people realize that if some sort of regulation, such as is proposed in the Hoover bill, is not put into effect very shortly that conditions will be intolerable. The passage of the Hoover bill will be the one big thing toward the start of a successful termination of our war with Germany.

Sincerely,
CHAS. C. YOUNGGREEN,
General Manager Kansas Farmer.

The matter has reached such importance in my State that mass meetings have been held in various cities; one at Lincoln, Kans., where they passed the resolutions that I shall be glad to make a part of my remarks without reading, as they are more or less lengthy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being no objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The following message was wired to President Wilson:

"President WILSON,
"Washington, D. C.:

"The citizens of Lincoln in mass convention demand that steps be taken to protect the public from the food speculators by taking over all food supplies and placing same under Government control. * * * We favor national prohibition as a war measure.

"E. J. RYAN, Mayor."

The following supplemental resolution was adopted as expressing more definitely the views of the people and carrying out in detail the purposes expressed in resolution No. 3:

"Whereas our Nation and the nations of the world are facing a food famine, and the success of our armies in the field in their titanic struggle depends on the supply; and

"Whereas unpatriotic men are taking advantage of this condition to make millions, regardless of their country's safety and the cry of her people for bread: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That we, the citizens of Lincoln in convention assembled, demand that the Government take immediate control of the large elevators, grain-supply houses, mills producing food, cold-storage plants, sugar refineries, and all jobbing houses handling food supplies; that the poor and rich alike may fare equally, and the Nation's resources of food might be better conserved, thereby making certain victory over those who now seek to defeat us in the world war; and be it further

"Resolved, That these resolutions be wired the Hon. Woodrow Wilson, our President, and a copy sent Gov. Capper and both United States Senators from Kansas and the Hon. JOHN CONNELLY, of the sixth district."

Mr. THOMPSON. The letter transmitting the resolutions says:

I inclose you copy of that part of some resolutions passed by the Lincoln people. They demand that some action be taken at once to stop the food speculators. It will not do to wait six months for an inquiry and then months more for a law, all of the time between the people being robbed.

Yours, respectfully,
E. A. MCFARLAND,
Chairman.

I have here a letter from a farmer who resides at Frankfort, Kans., Mr. Andrew Anderson, in which he states:

We read a great deal about Government control of food and food prices, but so far it seems to be only talk. We, the people, are getting anxious for action. It is astounding the way the prices are soaring. There seems no scarcity, as there is plenty to be had if you have the money. Something ought to be done at once.

Yours, truly,
ANDREW ANDERSON,
Frankfort, Kans.

Here is another letter from another section of the State, Abilene. It gives the prices of various necessities. It is short, and I will read it:

ABILENE, KANS., May 1½, 1917.

Hon. WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: What is being done by the Government to stop the gamble in foodstuffs?

When the situation has reached such a point where flour is sold at $4 a sack and potatoes 95 cents a peck in this country, where these things are grown, surely it is time for some sort of an intervention; and we urgently request you to act for us in the interests and welfare of the common people. May we expect this? We are confident that you will continue to serve us in this matter and see that the food speculators do not bring our country to ruin.

Very respectfully, yours,

LENA METZ.
MRS. MILTON POLLEY.
MRS. R. N. SIMMONS.
BETH MOTTER.

I have another similar letter from Shockey & Landes, hardware dealers of the same place; also a letter from Rudolph E. A. Gehring, of Osawatomie, Kans., which I ask permission to insert in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

ABILENE, KANS., April 17, 1917.

Senator THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: There are many serious questions confronting this country and Government to-day. Some of these things we believe can be handled and regulated without any great lot of trouble.

The question of foodstuffs is getting to the point where it must have some attention. For instance, the price of sugar is now beyond the reach of the average family. We can not find that there is any apparent shortage of foodstuffs that prices should be advanced so rapidly of late, and there is no reason for such advances. Many of these products are in speculators' hands, and as we can not learn of any shortage the matter should have investigation and Government control. We believe in good prices—to live and let live; but we do not believe that speculators should regulate the price of foodstuffs in this country.

Therefore, as stated, this question needs attention and quick action, and we believe by you giving it the right consideration that results can be had that will be satisfactory to all.

Yours, very truly,
SHOCKEY & LANDES.

OSAWATOMIE, KANS., June 3, 1917.

Hon. W. H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: During this time of direst trouble of war the food speculators are robbing the people with high prices on foodstuffs. The Government takes the best men of the Nation by conscript, many to be killed in this war, and lets the speculators have a free hand. We urge you to do all in your power to hasten the time of Government control of all foodstuffs.

Prices are soaring upward without good reasons. As we all know, there was no crop shortage. The war is the excuse. When by rights prices should be normal, so as to conserve the national finance.

I am voicing the sentiment of the general public. People will go hungry, which thing shouldn't be in our boasted land of the free and home of the brave.

We kindly ask you to use your power to bring about Government control of all foodstuffs. I am,

Respectfully, yours,
RUDOLPH E. A. GEHRING.

Mr. THOMPSON. Here is one from Salina, from Frank S. Rising. This is from a farmer who lives in the milling section, and I want to call attention in this letter to one statement that is particularly in issue in this matter. He says:

SALINA, KANS., May 3, 1917.

Senator W. H. THOMPSON.

DEAR SIR: I represent a body of laboring and producing men here as their financial officer, and, although this is not official, I want you to do all that you can in the Senate to relieve the high cost of living. The situation here has become absolutely unbearable.

We want you to work to try and prevent the dealing in futures of foodstuffs, and also the hoarding of foodstuffs in storage to enhance the price.

I will give you two concrete instances that will explain the situation here: A farmer living in this county went East to buy a carload of Holsteins and found that in Wisconsin, where he was, that potatoes were a drug upon the market at 75 cents per bushel, for the reason that they could get no cars to ship them in. Potatoes were selling at that time here at $3.10 per bushel. The reason of no cars is that the refrigerator cars are mostly owned by the storage shippers, and they control the use of them.

Flour is selling here for about $8 for a 98-pound sack.

A few days ago the Shellabarger Mill & Elevator Co., in an interview, published the statement that they had enough wheat on hand to run their mill for a year. Most of that wheat was bought close to $1 a bushel, while it is now priced here at $3.10 per bushel, and the price of flour is fixed on the later price.

The men whom I represent think that it is high time that the Government step in and, if necessary, seize this foodstuff and put it on the market at a reasonable profit on the cost.

I hope, Senator, that my letter does not reach the wastebasket before you see it, for relief we must have, and the only way I see to get it is to stop the gambling in futures and prevent the hoarding of the means of existence.

Very respectfully, yours,

FRANK S. RISING,
226 S. Tenth St., Salina, Kans.

I have another letter here from Wellington, Kans., in the central portion of the State, where a canvass of the entire business section of the city was taken as to the sentiment on this question. The writers, Mr. and Mrs. C. L. Clayton, state:

WELLINGTON, KANS., May 12, 1917.

Senator THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We, the undersigned, respectfully ask and urge that you support the proposed bill for the Government control of food prices and the conservation and equitable distribution of foodstuffs.

A recent canvass of the business men of Wellington by one of our newspapers showed that every one interviewed was in favor of the bill but one, and he was milling flour.

Hoping that this very important matter will meet with your favor, we are,

Yours, very respectfully,

C. L. CLAYTON.
ELLEN R. CLAYTON.

I have here another letter from the Western States Portland Cement Co., of Independence, Kans., from that branch of the business industries. It is as follows:

THE WESTERN STATES PORTLAND CEMENT CO.,
Independence, Kans., June 5, 1917.

Hon. W. H. THOMPSON, United States Senator,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Through the Chamber of Commerce of the United States we are advised of pending legislation along the lines of food administration. We believe this legislation is embodied in House bill 4630.

We believe this is in the interest of our armies and the Nation as a whole, as well as in the interest of our allies.

We hope, therefore, that such legislation may have your support.

Very truly, yours,

THE WESTERN STATES PORTLAND CEMENT CO.,
By C. B. MCVAY, Secretary-Treasurer.

I have a number of other letters that I shall refer to only briefly and have them made a part of my remarks. They are particularly from the laboring men and labor organizations of the State. Here is one from the Kansas State Federation of Labor, where resolutions were passed, signed by Charles Hamlin, secretary and treasurer:

LEAVENWORTH, KANS., June 20, 1917.

Hon. WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

HONORED SIR: Realizing the necessity of legislation to administer the distribution of the necessaries of life, the Kansas State Federation of Labor very respectfully urges that the Lever food administration bill be enacted into law before July 1, 1917.

Very respectfully, yours,

CHAS. HAMLIN,
Secretary-Treasurer Kansas State Federation of Labor.

I have letters from the United Garment Workers, the International United Brotherhood of Leather Workers, and the Coffeyville Central Labor Union, signed by the secretary, all of which I will ask to be embraced in my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

UNITED GARMENT WORKERS OF AMERICA,
LOCAL UNION NO. 158,
Fort Scott, Kans., June 21, 1917.

Senator WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am requested to write you on behalf of Local Union, No. 158, United Garment Workers of America, affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, urging you to use your influence and cast your vote in favor of the Lever food administration bill, and to see that this law is on the statute books before July 1.

Very sincerely, yours,

FLOSSIE BELLE CROSBY,
Secretary.

INTERNATIONAL UNITED BROTHERHOOD OF
LEATHER WORKERS ON HORSE GOODS,
Kansas City, Mo., June 21, 1917.

Hon. WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As a resident of Kansas City, Kans., I take this opportunity of addressing you in the name of the organization I represent, as well as my personal interests in the matter, upon the following subject:

I take the liberty at this time, by reason of the apparent imperative necessity for the enactment of legislation in the interests of the people as a measure of relief from the excessive high prices of all necessities of life.

To this end I ask your support of the Lever food administration bill and that you use your best influences in order that it may become a law at the earliest possible moment.

Thanking you for anything you may do in furtherance of this proposition, and with best wishes, I remain,

Respectfully, yours,

W. E. BRYAN,
General President.

COFFEYVILLE CENTRAL LABOR UNION,
Coffeyville, Kans., June 14, 1917.

Hon. WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: By instruction of the Coffeyville Central Labor Union I am writing you in regard to the food-control bill now before the House of Representatives (H. R. 4630). All of the labor unions of Coffeyville and vicinity, including the central labor union, have indorsed this bill, and in the event of its passage by the House we respectfully ask that you use your influence to secure its passage in the United States Senate, also.

The high cost of living vitally affects everyone, especially the workers, and it is of the utmost importance that this bill be passed in such a form as to be actually effective in bringing about an adequate distribution of the necessities of life. Thanking you in advance,

I am, very truly, yours,

THE COFFEYVILLE CENTRAL LABOR UNION,
By FRANK L. BRYAN, Secretary.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, from this matter it will be seen that the sentiment is general from practically all classes of citizens, and that they all well understand the issue. Everybody knows that the present prices of foodstuffs are extremely unreasonable and in many cases grossly exorbitant. It is very evident that somebody is making unnecessary profit upon practically every article which enters the household. It will not do to dismiss the subject by a simple waive of the hand with the statement that it is all caused by the war, for every thinking person who has given any consideration to the subject at all knows better. In many cases the existence of the war is simply given as an excuse for extortion.

Now, my experience in life, and particularly on the bench, has taught me to be tolerant, merciful, and forgiving. I believe I could forgive almost any crime, except treason or the crime committed by the food gambler in time of war, which is even worse than treason. While I do not ordinarily believe in capital punishment for crime, as I have never believed that man either as an individual or an official has the right to take human life, yet I could waive my conscientious scruples in this regard in the case of the food gambler. As to him, I would take pleasure in seeing him hanged as high as Haman, and I might even be persuaded to help spring the trap. There is no punishment too severe for him, and I believe a merciful God would forgive those who transgressed the divine law in putting him out of existence, for he is not only an enemy to his country, but a menace to society, and is not entitled to live on earth or to remain any place else this side of that place of eternal punishment commonly known as hell.

While I will not take the time to discuss in detail the exorbitant prices charged now for every necessity of life, figures on this subject having already been produced in the argument and printed in the RECORD, yet I desire especially to call attention to a comparative table of retail prices of foods in Washington during April, 1914, before the war, and in April, 1917, and in January and May, 1917, which fully support the contention that the prices of the necessities of life have gone beyond all reason, and from past experience we know that if something is not done now to prevent it prices will soar still higher.

From these tables it will be seen that during the first period mentioned—April, 1914, to April, 1917—prices have increased from 12 per cent to 400 per cent, principal increases being on the following articles, with the per cent as stated: Flour, 107 per cent; canned tomatoes, 142 per cent; corn meal, 100 per cent; navy beans, 140 per cent; lima beans, 185 per cent; sirloin steak, 42 per cent; round steak, 60 per cent; smoked sausages, 100 per cent; pure lard, 100 per cent; butter, 83 per cent; potatoes, 291 per cent; onions, 250 per cent; sweet potatoes, 114 per cent; cabbage, 400 per cent.

During the second period indicated above—January, 1917, to May, 1917—only four months, with the already high prices of necessities still soaring, flour finally sold at $15.20 per barrel, making a further increase of 58 per cent, and the price of navy beans had further increased 58 per cent; lima beans, 100 per cent; sirloin steak, 22 per cent; round steak, 28 per cent; butter, 28 per cent; lard, 31 per cent; potatoes, 66 per cent; sweet potatoes, 66 per cent; cabbage, 50 per cent.

I desire to reproduce these tables as a part of my remarks without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. THOMPSON. While the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] in his argument produced a large number of tables showing the market price of various articles at different times in different countries, yet in most instances these tables do not show the prices charged to the ultimate consumer, whom we are specially endeavoring to protect by this legislation.

There seems to be a difference of opinion as to just what Mr. Hoover said or meant in his statement to the Agricultural Committee in justification of this bill; but there is one thing certain, his testimony is perfectly clear on the question that somebody besides the farmer and producer has been getting the big end of the enormous prices, which were so suddenly sprung upon the people throughout the country. He made it clear that the farmer had sold practically all of his wheat by the 1st of January and that the average price he received was only about $1.60 per bushel, while the price of wheat on the market had reached the enormous figure of about $3 per bushel. So it is clear that the farmers' wheat, after it left his hands, has been traded and bartered around until somebody is getting about twice what it is really worth and has caused flour to rise to the enormous price of $15 per barrel. It is such things as this that the food bill is proposed to remedy and can remedy to a great extent, although, of course, no bill is perfect.

It has been charged that this bill is against the interest of the farmer and the producer, but, on the contrary, it has for its object his protection and benefit, and he is very carefully guarded by exemption from its operation in every clause where he might possibly be injured. The bill is drawn with the idea of encouraging the farmer to increase production to benefit the consumer, and administered under the guidance of Mr. Hoover, a man who understands this situation, not in theory, but in actual practice, will result in our Nation being better able to stand the ravages of war. It will not, of course, cure all evils, for no condition can be made perfect by one stroke of legislation, but it is a long step in the right direction. Some criticism has been made of Mr. Hoover by the opposition to this bill, but even they fail to suggest a more experienced or competent person to handle the food question. I venture to say that there is not another man in the United States, or in the world for that matter, whom the people of this country or our allies would prefer to intrust with this great responsibility than Mr. Hoover, who has voluntarily offered his services to carry forward this great work without hope of reward except the consciousness of being able to help a distressed people. There is no man in Congress who would even undertake such a task.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator to state the experience Mr. Hoover has had in fixing food prices.

Mr. THOMPSON. I will state to the Senator that I refused to be interrupted by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], and I would rather he would wait with his questions until I get through with my remarks.

Mr. SHIELDS. Certainly. I had understood that Mr. Hoover had had some experience in dispensing charity to paupers——

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. Hoover testified before the Agricultural Committee, stating his experience fully, and I believe it went far beyond that.

Mr. SHIELDS (continuing). But I did not know that he had had any experience in regulating the prices of property belonging to a free people, such as the American people, who are not mendicants or paupers.

Mr. THOMPSON. Has the Senator read the statement given by Mr. Hoover before the Agricultural Committee?

Mr. SHIELDS. I have not.

Mr. THOMPSON. I wish the Senator would read that and also the testimony of every other expert in reference to this matter, and I think the Senator will then agree with me that Mr. Hoover is entitled to the thanks and praise of the American people rather than unjust criticism by their Representatives.

I have here an article from London containing a statement of the British food controller, Lord Rhonda, which indicates how Mr. Hoover is appreciated abroad, even if he may not be appreciated by a few people in the Congress of the United States, who are opposed to this bill:

ANXIOUS ON FOOD BILL—BRITISH FOOD CONTROLLER WILL BREATHE EASIER WHEN UNITED STATES PASSES LAW.

LONDON, June 21.

"I hope I shall not be misconstrued or thought impatient when I say that the sooner your food-administration measures are enacted, the sooner we will breathe easier,' declared Lord Rhonda, England's new food controller to-day. He was discussing the congressional debate on the American food bill.

"If American resources are organized to their full capacity, I am confident the German hope of starving the allies, or even causing civilian unrest, due to scarcity or high prices, is doomed to failure.

"Unless we are assured of sufficient food to enable England and the allies to carry on the war to a successful conclusion, it is almost superfluous to appoint a food controller. We depend in a vital degree on the United States and Canada to keep up the supply.

EULOGIZES HOOVER.

"I have perfect confidence that the American Congress and the people will respond to the calls now made upon them."

Lord Rhonda paid high compliment to Herbert Hoover, potential food controller for the United States.

"One of the few attractions of this office," he remarked, "is the knowledge that President Wilson has such a man as Hoover with his character and experience and understanding of the allies' food situation."

There is one thing sure, and that is the price of all the necessities of life have been constantly rising for several years, even before the war, and Congress, as well as the judicial branch of the Government, seem unable to control the situation. No bill or other remedy has been suggested by the opponents of this measure that will meet the present situation to lower the extremely high prices which have already reached a point where no man of moderate means can live without becoming bankrupt. The scale of wages has been wholly unable to keep pace with the constantly rising prices.

I desire here to offer a table prepared by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, showing the union wage rates and hours of labor from 1907 to 1916, and of the retail prices of food, from 1907 to February, 1917, showing the per cent of increase. I desire to make it a part of my remarks without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Index numbers of union wage rates and hours of labor, 1907 to 1916, and of retail prices of food, 1907 to February, 1917.

Year.	Rates of wages per hour.	Full-time hours per week.	Rates of wages per week full time.	Retail prices of food.
1907	100	100	100	100
1908	101	100	101	103
1909	102	99	102	108
1910	105	99	104	113
1911	107	98	105	112
1912	109	98	107	119
1913	111	97	109	122
1914	114	97	111	125
1915	115	97	112	123
1916	119	96	116	139
January, 1917				156
February, 1917				162

Mr. THOMPSON. This table shows that while wages increased only 19 per cent between 1907 and 1916, retail prices have increased 39 per cent during the same time; and taking February, 1917, as a basis, retail prices of food increased 62 per cent. This is a condition which no laboring man can meet except by either beating the groceryman, the landlord, or the clothier, and he has no desire to do either; and in this country, with the greatest resources on earth, he ought not to be permitted to suffer such humiliation. Even though the laborer may meet these necessary obligations he is deprived entirely of the comforts of life, and hunger and poverty is knocking at the door of many humble citizens, while men in Congress stop to talk about the constitutionality of a law contrived to control large profits and talk of danger of placing the power to control hoarding of and gambling in foodstuffs, improper distribution, and unjust profits in the hands of the President of the greatest Republic on earth. Some of the opponents of the bill seem to suspicion the object and purposes of the President almost as much as they do the Kaiser. If the American people can not trust their President in times of war we might as well close the books of democracy and accept autocracy as our ideal form of government.

President Wilson in his letter of June 18, written to Congressman BORLAND, of Kansas City, Mo., hit the nail squarely on the head when he said:

THE WHITE HOUSE, June 18, 1917.

Hon. WILLIAM P. BORLAND,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. BORLAND: You are quite right about the food-administration measure. In my opinion, it is one of the most important and most imperatively necessary of the measures which have been proposed in connection with the war.

A certain disservice has been done the measure by speaking of it as the food-control bill. The object of the measure is not to control the food of the country but to release it from the control of speculators and other persons who will seek to make inordinate profits out of it, and to protect the people against the extortions which would result. It seems to me that those who oppose the measure ought very seriously to consider whether they are not playing into the hands of such persons and whether they are not making themselves responsible, should they succeed, for the extraordinary and oppressive price of food in the United States. Foodstuffs will, of course, inevitably be high, but it is possible by perfectly legitimate means to keep them from being unreasonably and oppressively high.

I hope and believe that the Congress will see the measure in this light, and that it will come to an early passage, for time is of the essence. The legislation should be secured by the 1st of July to make the country safe against the dangers it is meant to guard against.

Cordially and sincerely, yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

The President has driven straight to the heart of the issue and Congress must respond. There can be neither hesitation nor halting. Congress dare not adjourn without doing something helpful on this subject if its Members expect to retain the confidence of the people. Every consideration of national defense, national honor, of free government and free institutions, and the welfare of the whole world demands that Congress follow where the President has led in the matter of food control during this greatest and most horrible of all wars.

It is a program that sweeps aside all fine-spun theories and recognizes the facts as they exist. It is only by mobilization and coordination that we can employ our power to the utmost effectiveness, and to employ anything short of our utmost power is to prolong the war with all that means in human suffering and misery, loss of life, and destruction of property. No true patriot will put anything in the way to bring this war for humanity and the liberty of the world to a speedy and successful conclusion.

I may later have something to say on the prohibition features of this bill if it should seem advisable before voting on the sections relating to the subject.

RIFLES, MACHINE GUNS AND FIELD ARTILLERY (S. DOC. NO. 56).

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 15th instant, certain information relative to the difference in types between rifles, machine guns and field artillery, and ammunition of the United States Army and those of the British Army and the French Army. The communication will be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The communication is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, June 25, 1917.

SIR: In compliance with the resolution passed by the Senate of the United States on June 15, 1917, I am furnishing the following information in reply to the questions asked therein with reference to the difference in types between the rifles, machine guns and field artillery and ammunition therefor of the United States Army and those of the English Army and the French Army:

First question. Has the British Enfield rifle been adopted for the American Army; and if so are such rifles being chambered so as to fit the American type of rifle cartridge?

Answer. It is intended to retain the American rifle of the model of 1903—sometimes called the "Springfield rifle"—for the use of the United States troops, and to increase the number available as rapidly as the manufacturing capacity of the two Government armories, at Springfield and Rock Island, will permit. The 500,000 and more of these rifles available for use in the war with Germany which are on hand in the United States, and over 200,000,000 rounds of ammunition therefor, will thus be fully utilized. Because troops will probably be raised faster than they can be supplied with rifles of the model of 1903, with the above stated production, Enfield rifles of the model of 1914, manufactured in the United States, with different chambering and other modification to fit them to use the regular United States ammunition, will be newly made by the three establishments in this country which have made them for England, and used to supplement our own supply. We shall thus probably have two models of rifles in the field, but, and much more important, we shall have only a single model of ammunition, so that there will be no danger of confusion of ammunition supply.

Second question. Are machine guns for the use of the American Army using the same type of rifle carriage as the Army rifle used by the American Army?

Answer. Yes.

Third question. Do the American cartridges for use in rifles and machine guns differ in size or otherwise so as to prevent their being used in the rifles and machine guns of the English or French? If so, what is the character of the difference, and what advantage is gained thereby?

Answer. The American cartridge for use in rifles and machine guns can not be used in the rifles and machine guns of either the English or French. As the English and French cartridges differ from each other, the American cartridges would have to differ from at least one of them. Aside from the difference in dimensions, the American cartridge is a rimless cartridge, while the British and French cartridges are rim cartridges. The use of the rimless cartridge minimizes the risk of jamming in the magazine, and it is otherwise superior to the rim type.

Fourth question. To what extent does the field artillery of the American Army differ in caliber and character of ammunition used from that of the French and English Armies?

Answer. In the field artillery of the American Army are cannon of somewhat similar calibers to those used in the French and English Armies. The field artillery of these two armies, even the cannon of approximately the same caliber, differs materialy in the size of the chamber, muzzle velocity, weight of projectile, and type of fuze; that of the American Army would therefore necessarily differ from one or the other.

Fifth question. Can the ammunition of the English or French Armies be used in the field artillery of the American Army?

Answer. The ammunition of the English or French Armies can not be used in the field artillery of the American Army.

Sixth question. If the American ammunition for rifles, machine guns, and field artillery is not interchangeable for like British or French guns, what advantage is gained by having it differ from that of the English or the French Army?

Answer. The ammunition for rifles, machine guns, and field artillery of the American Army, like that of the English and French Armies, is the result of development along independent lines, the type of one country usually having been fully developed and in process of manufacture before the details of that of another country became known. In case of an enemy this lack of interchangeability of ammunition may be of material advantage, but in case of an ally it is a decided disadvantage. With reference to the present situation, it would be highly advantageous if our ammunition were interchangeable with that of those allies with whom our troops will directly operate, and with whom they could share common sources of supply. For operating with the French the disadvantage of not having our rifles and machine guns fitted for the English ammunition is small, and is more than counterbalanced by the ability to use the quite material supply of rifles and ammunition on hand, as set forth above in the answer to the first question. The French rifles and machine guns are not, and have not been, manufactured in this country; hence, through lack of manufacturing facilities, the question of the use of the French ammunition for rifles and machine guns could not be considered.

With respect to artillery ammunition, it may be stated that the present plans contemplate the eventual use of ammunition of the French type for most of the calibers, which the conditions of supply and manufacture render practicable.

Very respectfully,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 1811) providing for the counting of service in the Army or Navy of the United States as equivalent to residence and cultivation upon homestead entries, and in the event of the soldier's death in such service providing for the issuance of patent for such land to his widow or minor children, with amendments, in which it requested concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 33) to relieve the owners of mining claims who have been mustered into the military or naval service of the United States as officers or enlisted men from performing assessment work during the term of such service, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 67) to fix the status and rights of officers of the Public Health Service when serving with the Coast Guard, the Army, or the Navy, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 4892) authorizing the President to take possession, on behalf of the United States, for use as sites for permanent aviation stations for the Army and Navy and for aviation-school purposes, of the whole of North Island in the harbor of San Diego, Cal., and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4188) to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products, agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. LEVER, Mr. LEE of Georgia, Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi, Mr. HAUGEN, and Mr. MCLAUGHLIN managers of the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 2453) to authorize condemnation proceedings of lands for military purposes, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented memorials of the Central Labor Union of Brooklyn, N. Y.; of Bakery and Confectionary Workers' International Union, No. 22, of New York City, N. Y.; and of John W. Edmonds, of New York City, N. Y., remonstrating against national prohibition, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions of the Christian Endeavor Union of Milwaukee, Wis.; of the members and ministers of the Baptist Church of Stanton, Ill.; of Ronald Reginald Simpson, of Frederick County, Md.; and of Sara A. V. Medtart, of West Philadelphia, Pa., praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of San Jose, Cal., praying for the passage of the so-called daylight-saving bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the San Francisco Art Association and Museum of Fine Arts of California, praying for the exemption from taxation of gifts to religious and charitable institutions, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of the State Board of Agriculture of Sacramento, Cal., praying for the exemption from taxation of nonprofiting agricultural fairs, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. NELSON presented telegrams in the nature of petitions from sundry citizens of Gray Eagle, St. Paul, Willmar, Granite Falls, Lesueur, Mankato, Duluth, Minneapolis, and Ottawa, all in the State of Minnesota, praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented telegrams in the nature of memorials from sundry citizens of Red Wing, Minneapolis, Mankato, St. Paul, and Duluth, all in the State of Minnesota, remonstrating against national prohibition, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions of the Danish-Norwegian Baptist Conference of Artichoke, Minn., and of sundry citizens of Ghent and Excelsior, Minn., praying for national prohibition and that a curb be placed on speculation in food products, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GALLINGER presented a petition of Bay Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, of Sanbornton, N. H., praying for the establishment of maximum and minimum prices for food products, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions of Rev. B. Alfred Dumm, of Plymouth, N. H. and of 246 citizens of Woodsville, N. H., praying for national prohibition, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. McLEAN presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of New Haven, Conn., praying that an appropriation be made for the creation of a thoroughly equipped air fleet for the Government, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented telegrams in the nature of memorials from sundry citizens of Ansonia, Terryville, and New Haven, and of the Wine and Beer Dealers' Association of Willimantic, all in the State of Connecticut, remonstrating against national prohibition, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions of Local Union No. 192, Brotherhood of Painters, Decorators, and Paperhangers of America, of Stamford, Conn., and of Local Union No. 79, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, of New Haven, Conn., praying for Federal control of food products, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of Local Union No. 395, Cigar Makers' International Union of America, of Waterbury, Conn., remonstrating against the proposed increase in the tax on cigars, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented telegrams in the nature of petitions from sundry citizens of Bridgeport and Waterbury, and of the congregation of the United Church of Bridgeport, and of the Connecticut Dry Federation of the First Baptist Church of Shelton, all in the State of Connecticut, and of Webutuck Grange, No. 86, Patrons of Husbandry of America Union, New York, praying for national prohibition, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I ask unanimous consent to submit two petitions for printing in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the petitions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SEWARD, ALASKA, June 27, 1917.

Senator MILES POINDEXTER,
Washington, D. C.:

We to-day cabled Federal Trade Commission as follows: "In preparing to provide against probable coal famine we call your attention to vast deposits commercial and naval coal of Matanuska fields. The Government railroad from Seward to coal fields can be completed by January 1 if money, labor, and materials are made available and work rushed. However, this should be urged immediately and advantage taken of the summer season. We recommend that you urge Congress to appropriate sufficient funds to complete road between Seward and coal fields and construction of facilities at Seward for handling coal as per recent recommendations of Secretary of Navy. We urge consideration of this matter as an emergency and war measure."

SEWARD CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

SEATTLE, WASH., June 20, 1917.

To the EXECUTIVE BOARD OF THE MUNICIPAL LEAGUE OF SEATTLE.

GENTLEMEN: The undersigned committee of the Municipal League of Seattle on the conduct of the War respectfully report that they have adopted the resolutions hereto attached, and recommend that the same be approved by the executive board and that copies thereof be furnished to the press for publication and be transmitted to our two Senators at Washington and the Congressman of this district, Hon. JOHN F. MILLER.

SEATTLE, WASH, June 22, 1917.

The foregoing recommendation, together with the resolutions hereto attached, were this day approved and adopted by the executive board of the municipal league.

AUSTIN E. GRIFFITHS,
President.

Be it resolved, That it is the sentiment of the Municipal League of Seattle that the food-control bill now pending before Congress should be speedily enacted, and that the Federal Government should immediately assume the necessary control of the production and distribution of food supplies for the period of the war.

Be it resolved by the Municipal League of Seattle, That the time has passed for discussion or debate on the merits of our entrance into the war. The Nation is at war with a powerful and implacable enemy. All the forces of the Nation—military, naval, political, economic, intellectual, and moral—must be organized and energized for the vigorous prosecution of the war to a speedy and victorious conclusion. Acts in opposition to the enforcement of laws that declare war and provide for its prosecution constitute treason, and argument, whether by word of mouth or printed pamphlet or through newspapers, tending to encourage or incite such opposition is also treason. Such appeals give aid and comfort to the enemy, prolong the war, and add to the death list of our boys fighting the battles of our country; be it further

Resolved, That it is the sentiment of this league that during the war it is inadvisable to permit the public streets of the city of Seattle to be used as a forum by agitators and others seeking to voice their disloyal sentiments toward our country in this time of its peril. Such speakers often sneer at our flag and at the uniforms of our soldiers and sailors. These public utterances inevitably breed riot and menace the peace, safety, and welfare of our city. Our streets are public highways, and our citizens are entitled to use them without being assailed with the vitriol of treason.

Mr. GORE. I desire to have printed in the RECORD a telegram I have received from Chickasha, Okla. I may say that on Saturday last I obtained permission of the Senate to have this telegram printed in the RECORD, together with others, but by an error it was left out.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHICKASHA, OKLA., June 23, 1917.

Senator T. P. GORE,
Washington, D. C.:

We, the farmers of Grady County, in mass meeting, wish to express our heartfelt appreciation of your efforts in our behalf on the proposed food-control legislation.

T. D. WHITE, Chairman.
J. P. GIBBS, Secretary.

MEDALS OF HONOR.

Mr. WARREN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 1720) to provide for the award of medals of honor and distinguished-service medals, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 73) thereon.

DESIGNS OF QUARTER DOLLAR.

Mr. OWEN. From the Committee on Banking and Currency, I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 3548) providing for the modification of the designs of the current quarter dollar, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration. It will take only a moment. A similar bill has passed both Houses of Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCNARY in the chair). Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I understood the Senator from Oklahoma to say that the bill had already passed both branches of Congress.

Mr. OWEN. A similar bill has passed both Houses, it having passed the Senate on April 30, and the bill which I now report passed the House of Representatives a few days ago.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator does not mean that a similar bill has passed both Houses at the same session of Congress?

Mr. OWEN. Yes; that is true. The bills which have passed both Houses are practically identical in terms; and, I repeat, a similar bill to this passed the Senate on the 30th of April of this year.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator from Oklahoma reports the House bill?

Mr. OWEN. Yes; I report the House bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That, for the purpose of increasing the artistic merit of the current quarter dollar, the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to make slight modifications in the details of the designs, in accordance with sketches submitted by the sculptor, whose models were accepted under date of May 23, 1916, and now being used in the execution of the coins.

No changes shall be made in the emblems or devices used. The modifications shall consist of the changing of the position of the eagle, the rearrangement of the stars and lettering, and a slight concavity given to the surface. Such changes shall be made and completed on or before July 1, 1918.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. OWEN. I enter a motion to reconsider the votes by which the bill (S. 2099) providing for the modification of the design of the current quarter dollar was ordered to a third reading and passed, and I move that the House of Representatives be requested to return the bill to the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

EMPLOYMENT OF MESSENGER.

Mr. THOMPSON. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate I report back favorably, with an amendment, Senate resolution 93, submitted by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The Senate by unanimous consent proceeded to consider the resolution.

The amendment was, in line 5, after the word "until," to strike out "otherwise provided for by law" and insert "March 4, 1918."

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate is hereby authorized and directed to place on the Senate rolls a messenger for the minority, at the rate of $1,200 per annum, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate until March 4, 1918.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CALDER:

A bill (S. 2528) to amend section 2 of the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. OWEN:

A bill (S. 2529) defining duties of the Medical Department of the United States Army, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 2530) to establish a sanitary reserve corps for the Public Health Service; to the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine.

By Mr. WEEKS:

A bill (S. 2531) to prevent the publication of inventions by the grant of patents that might be detrimental to the public safety or convey useful information to the enemy, to stimulate invention, and provide adequate protection to owners of patents, and for other purposes (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Patents.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. CALDER submitted two amendments, intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill (H. R. 4285), which were referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PHELAN submitted an amendment, intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill (H. R. 4285), which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

FOOD-CONTROL BILL.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, several days ago I submitted a series of amendments, intended to be proposed to the food-control bill (H. R. 4961), and they were ordered printed. Since that time the House bill on the same subject has been received, referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and reported back with amendments. The House bill as amended makes inapplicable several of the amendments which I have proposed. I therefore now submit four proposed amendments to the bill under consideration, and ask that they be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will lie on the table and be printed.

WINE AS A BEVERAGE.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] had inserted recently in the RECORD a criticism of wine. I ask that a statement by Secretary Vance of the American Wine Association, of New York, together with a report on wine by the French Academy of Sciences, be printed in the RECORD for the information of the Senate.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Article by Secretary Vance, of American Wine Association, New York.]

AMERICAN VITICULTURE SHOULD BE AND MUST BE PROTECTED AND ENCOURAGED.

It has been and is the wise and long-settled policy of every nation to aid and promote viticulture, or the growing of grapes and the making of wines, as it is an important branch of agriculture. And upon agriculture rests the progress and prosperity of the State and the Nation.

This has been the recognized policy in the United States for many years. The results of this policy are seen in the inducement given to the farmers to plant vines and in the establishment of experimental farms or stations by the Government of the United States and by the government of many States.

Under this policy tens of thousands of acres have been planted with grapes, and many millions of dollars have been invested in the vineyards and wineries of this country.

Here are some statistical facts in regard to American viticulture taken from the latest official reports:

There are 350,000 acres of grapes in the State of California, 60,000 acres of vineyards in New York State, 12,000 acres in Ohio, 10,000 acres in Michigan, 5,000 acres in Missouri, 3,000 acres in New Jersey, 5,000 acres in Virginia and North Carolina and the Southern States, and several thousand acres of vines in the other States.

The capital invested in vineyards is not less than $175,000,000, and $27,000,000 in wineries, making a total investment of $202,000,000. Over 175,000 people are dependent upon our viticultural industry. This includes 20,000 heads of families that own vineyards, and those employed in cultivating, picking, and handling the grapes and wines.

The great bulk of the grape crop is used for making wine. If the grapes could not be so used, it would bring ruin and disaster to all the thousands of people directly and indirectly interested in the industry.

The production of native wines varies according to the size of the grape crops. The average annual production is around 50,000,000 gallons.

To recapitulate:

Acreage of vineyards	448,000
Total capital invested	$202,000,000
People employed	175,000
Yearly production (gallons)	50,000,000
Yearly disbursements	$34,500,000

Of the annual disbursements other than for grapes and wages are many millions of dollars for taxes, transportation, machinery and supplies, insurance, rents, license fees, etc.

There are many reasons why viticulture should be encouraged in this country. We have in the United States almost every kind of climate and soil, the choicest varieties of grapes, the enterprise and capital, and the most intelligent labor in the world. Hence all the well-known types of wines produced in Europe are obtained in this country. It should be a matter of patriotism and pride to promote this industry, which is such a big asset in our agricultural and material well-being.

Not only the economic but the dietary value of wine has been recognized among the nations of continental Europe, where it is part of the daily food of over 150,000,000 people. The wine drinkers of these countries are the most sober and temperate people of the world. In France wine is classed by the scientists as a "hygienic beverage," as it is an aid to digestion and assimilation and an item of food. Hence the French Government furnishes wine as part of the daily ration to its soldiers, who in health, vigor, and efficiency have proved its value under the most severe test that can be made.

As no nation either at war or at peace has prohibited the use of wine, it would be wrong and unjust to do so in this country, where it can not be honestly claimed that such prohibition is necessary for temperance or for the conservation of food. Most of the grapes grown for wines are called "wine grapes" and are good only for wines. In other words, they are not what are called "table grapes," which are used for eating. Hence if wine making were prohibited the farmers could not sell their crops, which would be almost a dead loss.

More than that, to stop wine making for only one season would practically ruin the industry. It would take years to recover from such stoppage. If the grapes could not be sold and used the farmers would neglect their vines and tear them out. It takes from four to five years for a grapevine to come into full bearing. Unless the future were sure and certain, there would be no inducement for the farmers to plant grapes. Meanwhile the wineries would be idle and the wine industry would not recover, if ever, in years.

Thus wine making is in an entirely different position from beer making or whisky making. Beer and whisky do not depend upon a fruit crop, but upon grains and cereals which can be obtained during any month or time of the year, so that beer and whisky can be made any day or month of the year, while wine can be made only when the grapes are ripe and ready to be pressed and used.

REPORT ON WINE BY THE FRENCH ACADEMY OF SCIENCES.

[Translated from Feuille Vinicole de la Gironde, May 10, 1917.]

M. Ambroise Rendu, councillor, has addressed to our confrère, M. Appell, the following letter:

"MY DEAR PRESIDENT: It is necessary at this time to think of our orphans and the dangers to which they are exposed. One of these dangers is alcohol, and it is perhaps the greatest. We should fight against this scourge, but, as you know, we can only suppress by replacing.

"In my opinion the academy of sciences would honor itself greatly if it established a fine prize for competition on the subject of replacing alcohol by a tonic and stimulating beverage.

"We should be able to find one, and what a service it would be to humanity! Science has found the machines of death; it should find the remedy. I submit my suggestion to you and pray for an answer."

This letter was received by the academy of sciences, which referred the proposition of M. Rendu to the commission on public health.

The commission at a meeting on March 5 last examined into the proposition, and by M. Lavaran has made the following report:

It is evident that M. Rendu proposes to put into competition investigations of tonic and stimulating beverages; that he considers the "hygienic beverages" in our country as likely to favor the progress of alcoholism; that it is also evident, if the academy of sciences adopts his proposition, it will lend itself to this view of the matter.

Are alcoholic beverages, known as "hygienic," such as wine, beer, cider, so dangerous from the point of view of alcoholism that it is necessary to substitute for them a tonic and stimulating drink, non-alcoholic, whose discovery presents many difficulties?

Does wine, which is the most popular and most generally consumed in France, play an important rôle in the evils of alcoholism? Your commission does not believe it.

Alcoholism or drunkenness is much less in evidence in the viticultural districts than in the other districts where little wine is consumed, and even in viticultural districts most of the cases of alcoholism are not from the use of wine, but from brandy, and particularly the brandy from marc or pomace, the manufacture and consumption of which have been increased on account of the privileges given to the farmer distillers (bouilleurs de cru).

There will be persons who will abuse wine, but such persons constitute but a handful compared with the immense number of consumers who use wine and do not abuse it. Wine is a most healthful beverage, tonic, and gently stimulating; it aids digestion and corrects the bad quality of drinking water; it would truly be absurd to proscribe wine under the pretext of abuse. During the war, which has now lasted nearly three years, wine has been a precious aid and comfort to our brave soldiers. To throw discredit upon wine without valid hygienic motive would be all the more regrettable, as France is a great viticultural country, and our wines are celebrated all over the world, representing one of the largest sources of our wealth.

Cider and beer, as wine, deserve the name of "hygienic beverages." If, in Normandy and Brittany, alcoholism is too pronounced, it is not because of cider; but here the farmer distillers (bouilleurs de cru) have caused the trouble in spreading the use of brandy known as "calvados."

Beer is an excellent drink and its use is very widespread among the people of Germany, of England, of the Scandinavian countries, of Belgium, of Holland, etc.

In conclusion, we may quote the remarks of our late confrère, Emil Duclaux, from his book entitled "Social Hygiene" (pp. 193, 211):

"In a beverage like wine, beer, or cider, the alcohol causes a mild excitation of the nervous system, which reacts pleasantly upon the mind and upon the body, hastens a lazy digestion, or gives temporary activity or power to the muscles. It is an excitant, just as is coffee, tea, or the spices. So far as it is used within physiological limits, there are no sound arguments against its use.

"It is foolish," added Duclaux, "to try to eliminate wine and beer, which do not present any danger, when their use is temperate.

"Let the water drinkers be content with their favorite liquid, but do not trouble the peace of the moderate drinkers of wine or beer, for we have no right to do so, and, besides, it does more harm than good."

In brief, your commission, considering that it is desirable to press the campaign against alcoholism, particularly the complete suppression of the farmer distillers, believes it would be wrong to discredit hygienic beverages whose use is without danger, and holds that it is not necessary to give further consideration to the proposition of M. Rendu.

BRITISH EXPERIENCE SERIES.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I present a very valuable compilation of the British war laws affecting employers of workmen and output since the beginning of the present war. I ask to have the matter referred to the Committee on Printing with a view to having it printed as a public document.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of New Mexico in the chair). Without objection, it will be so ordered.

THE PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 67) to fix the status and rights of officers of the Public Health Service when serving with the Coast Guard, the Army, or the Navy, which were, in line 3, to strike out "and other persons"; in line 4, to strike out "aboard" and insert "on"; in line 5, after the word "detailed," to insert "in time of war"; in line 6, after the word "entitled," to strike out all down to and including the word "rights" in line 8; in line 10, after the word "Guard," to insert "Army or Navy, as the case may be, and shall be subject to the laws prescribed for the government of the service to which they are respectively detailed."

Mr. RANSDELL. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 4892. An act authorizing the President to take possession, on behalf of the United States, for use as sites for permanent aviation stations for the Army and Navy and for aviation-school purposes, of the whole of North Island in the harbor of San Diego, Cal., and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 13) extending the time within which the "joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to issue temporary permits for additional diversions of water from the Niagara River" shall remain in effect, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

DIVERSION OF WATERS OF NIAGARA RIVER.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 13) extending the time within which the "Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to issue temporary permits for additional diversions of water from the Niagara River" shall remain in effect.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House of Representatives, request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. SMITH of Arizona, Mr. SHIELDS, and Mr. BRANDEGEE conferees on the part of the Senate.

CONSERVATION OF FOOD AND FUEL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4961) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I do not know whether any other Senator is ready to go ahead at this time or not.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I ask the Senator if he has risen to suggest an adjournment or a recess?

Mr. KENYON. No; I intended to call for a quorum if no one is ready to go ahead. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Borah	Johnson, S. Dak.	Nelson	Smoot
Chamberlain	Jones, N. Mex.	New	Sterling
Culberson	Jones, Wash.	Norris	Sutherland
Cummins	Kellogg	Overman	Thomas
Curtis	Kendrick	Page	Thompson
Fernald	Kenyon	Ransdell	Tillman
France	King	Reed	Townsend
Frelinghuysen	Kirby	Shafroth	Trammell
Gerry	Knox	Sheppard	Vardaman
Gronna	La Follette	Sherman	Wadsworth
Hale	McCumber	Shields	Warren
Harding	McKellar	Smith, Ariz.	Williams
Hollis	McLean	Smith, Ga.	Wolcott
James	McNary	Smith, Mich.
Johnson, Cal.	Martin	Smith, S. C.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-eight Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I do not know of anyone who is prepared to speak on the bill, and I ask that the bill be read for action on the committee amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bill will be read for amendment, the committee amendments to be first considered.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 1, line 8, after the word "feeds," to insert "and containers therefor."

Mr. WADSWORTH. I wish to ask the Senator in charge of the bill what his idea is as to the scope of the word "containers."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator is a member of the committee, and he will remember that the suggestion was made by the chairman of the committee as being a part of some of the food supplies and practically inseparable from them. He thought it ought to be inserted in order to cover the items in the bill, and there was no objection to its insertion.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I will not object to adopting the amendment, but it strikes me it would include tin cans, baskets, boxes, barrels, and sacks. It is quite difficult to know how far it would go and whether it is at all necessary to put in the word "containers," they being an infinitesimal part of the cost of the product. I do not interpose an objection now to the extent of asking for a roll call on the adoption of the amendment, but I desire to state that I think it is wholly unnecessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 1, line 8, after the word "fuel," to strike out "and articles required for their production" and insert "including petroleum and its products, steel and iron and their products, copper and its products, hemp, jute, and sisal and their products, lead, timber, lumber, farm implements and machinery, and fertilizers"; on page 2, line 6, before the word "manipulations," to insert "or"; and in the same line, after the word "manipulations," to strike out "and private controls"; and in line 9, after the word "war," to strike out "For such purposes the instrumentalities, means, methods, powers, authorities, duties, obligations, and prohibitions hereinafter set forth are created, established, conferred, and prescribed," so as to make the section read:

That, by reason of the existence of a state of war, it is essential to the national security and defense, for the successful prosecution of the war, and for the support and maintenance of the Army and Navy to assure an adequate supply and equitable distribution, and to facilitate the movement of foods, feeds, and containers therefor, fuel, including petroleum and its products, steel and iron and their products, copper and its products, hemp, jute, and sisal and their products, lead, timber, lumber, farm implements and machinery, and fertilizers, hereafter in this act called necessaries; to prevent, locally or generally, scarcity, monopolization, hoarding, injurious speculation, or manipulations affecting such supply, distribution, and movement; and to establish and maintain governmental control of such necessaries during the war.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I have necessarily been absent a great deal on account of the meetings of the Finance Committee. I should like to inquire whether the bill has been read and only amendments are being read now?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The bill is being read for action on the committee amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is being read.

Mr. PENROSE. Is the bill being read through?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It is being read now for action on the committee amendments.

Mr. PENROSE. I understand that only committee amendments are being read?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No; the Secretary is reading the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The text is being read, and the committee amendments are being taken up as we reach them in accordance with the unanimous-consent agreement given by the Senate.

Mr. PENROSE. I did not know that had been given.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, another parliamentary inquiry: Is this the proper time for individual amendments to the committee amendments?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Then I should like to offer as an amendment on page 2, line 2, after the word "products," where it last occurs, to insert "print paper and its products."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Arizona to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. BORAH. What is the idea of the Senator as to that being one of the necessaries in times of war?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. We have come to the question of even watching to see exactly what is printed in the papers. I know of no one machine that could act more for the good or evil of our country in time of war than print paper and the products of it in the shape of the printed matter to be circulated.

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator will pardon me, does he propose in this bill to proceed with a most extraordinary system of censorship?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. It is entirely a war clause. It is just as certainly true of half a dozen things in the bill as of print paper. The investigation has shown, and the Senate has the printed findings of the Trade Commission, the condition of the print-paper industry in this country. Animadversions have been made on this floor in the last two days about the outrages which have been perpetrated against 20,000 small papers and their inability to get print paper at all at times and a profit of 180 per cent being in the hands of the manufacturers. It has been recommended that this matter be handled by the Government and distributed largely by it. I know no better place to put the matter than in this particular bill for some half dozen reasons.

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator is going to insist upon his amendment, I will ask that this particular amendment go over, because it will take some time to dispose of it.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I have no objection to that. I myself would prefer to have it go over, for I can prepare the better what little I have to say upon it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah will state it.

Mr. KING. After the disposition of the committee-reported amendment to this section will it be in order to move to strike out certain words and lines in the section inclusive of those reported by the committee but not exclusively the words reported by the committee, as an amendment to the section?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks so.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I understand that through the objection entered by the Senator from Idaho this entire section will go over, or can other amendments be offered now and the particular amendment of the Senator from Arizona be passed over?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not understand anything about it. The proposition is up to the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Then I offer the following amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senate is willing to have it go over it will go over; if it is not, it will not go over.

Mr. BORAH. I think the Senator might offer his amendment and then have the entire matter go over.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. On page 2, line 4, after the word "fertilizers," I move to insert "and fertilizer ingredients."

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, before the amendment proposed by the committee goes over, as I presume it will, I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill a question with regard to its interpretation. The amendment brings within the scope of the bill steel and iron and copper, for instance, and their products; also timber and lumber. Would the bill cover a product composed partly of iron and steel and partly of lumber and some other material?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am inclined to think it would cover a combination of articles of that kind.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not know whether the matter had been under consideration, and unless it is made perfectly clear I intend to offer an amendment which will provide that the bill shall cover the joint products of any two or more of the materials mentioned in the section.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It was the intention of the committee that it should cover combinations of these different elements, but if it does not do that or the Senator thinks it is not broad enough to do it, so far as I am personally concerned I shall not object to have such an amendment proposed.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am afraid it would not cover these joint products. I submitted a proposed amendment a few days ago, which is on the table, intended to reach that result. I shall offer it at the proper time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the amendment going over?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry before the Senator offers his amendment. I offered an amendment, in line 4, after the word "fertilizers." Do I understand that this amendment was offered and incorporated in the amendment, and then when the amendment is taken up it is to be voted upon, or would it be in order for the amendment that I propose to be voted on now?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is an amendment pending offered by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH]. He offered an amendment to the amendment of the committee and suggested that his amendment should go over. Pending the suggestion, and before there had been unanimous consent given to have it go over, the Senator from South Carolina offered an amendment. The Senator from South Carolina can not now or hereafter have his amendment considered until the amendment of the Senator from Arizona has been disposed of one way or the other.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Then I suggest that that amendment be disposed of one way or another so that we can act intelligently and in order on other amendments which may be proposed to the section.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. While the bill is being read can an amendment be offered by a Senator and considered in addition to what is already in the bill? I have an amendment to offer.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If any Senator has an amendment to a committee amendment, and there being no preceding amendment pending to the committee amendment, of course it can be considered.

Mr. McKELLAR. This is not an amendment to the committee amendment, but an amendment to the whole section.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the unanimous-consent agreement it must wait until the committee amendments are disposed of.

Mr. McKELLAR. It must wait until another section is read or the whole bill is read?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate gave unanimous consent to first consider the amendments of the committee. They are amendable by the Senate. Other amendments to the bill are not in order until the amendments of the committee have been disposed of.

Mr. McKELLAR. I did not understand the rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to this amendment going over?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It seems to me the amendment including print paper might be disposed of now. I should like very much if possible to dispose of these amendments as we reach them in the bill.

Mr. BORAH. Is the chairman disposed to approve the amendment for print paper and its products?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not think it ought to be included, and that is one reason why I want to have the question submitted. I do not think it ought to be added here. The items which go into the bill are really the items which tend to production, and this certainly does not come within that category.

Mr. BORAH. As far as I am concerned I would not like to see it go in this bill. It is a separate and distinct proposition. In the first place, I am not willing to place the newspapers of the country in such an attitude toward the Government that they must go to the Government in order to get the material with which to print. I do not know how the Senate feels about it, but I should like to have a full Senate here before the vote is taken, and a word of explanation before it goes in. I do not want to delay the bill, but if the Senate wants to go ahead with it I shall simply call for a quorum and let it go to a vote, and if defeated reserve it for the Senate.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not want the Senator to understand that I object to his making a full presentation of the matter. I only expressed a desire to have the amendments disposed of as we reach them, but if the Senator prefers to discuss it at length I shall not insist on that course.

Mr. BORAH. I do not want to discuss it at length, but it is a most important matter. The idea of putting the print paper and products under the control of the Government is to my mind a vicious form of censorship.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am inclined to agree with the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. If for any reason it should go into the bill I should make every effort I could to defeat the bill in its entirety, because I am not willing to swallow all the evils that can possibly be put into the bill in order to get the very small portion of what is supposed to be of benefit.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, in this particular amendment we have copper and its products; hemp, jute, sisal, and their products; lead; timber, out of which 95 per cent of the print paper in America is made; farm implements and machinery; and fertilizers. If the Senator can see any reason why lumber, timber, and its products should be included in the bill and print paper should not, with the known outrageous imposition that those people make especially upon 20,000 of the small papers in the United States I should like to hear the distinction that can be drawn between the powers granted and the result that is reached favorable to this country in the one case that would not follow more strongly in the other.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Idaho is not responsible for anything that is in the bill, and I therefore do not need to answer that proposition, but I am surprised to see a prominent member of the majority party stand here and say that the print-paper combination and monopoly has gotten beyond the control of the laws of this country. We have two separate and distinct statutes upon the statute books any one of which is sufficient, if enforced, to protect the users of print paper and put the violators of the law behind the bars.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Will that disseminate the printing? Suppose you put them behind the bars, what would that accomplish, if the paper could not be used except at a profit of 180 per cent?

Mr. BORAH. You can get it where it can be used if you enforce the laws on the statute books.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. It is proposed to be placed on the statute books in this bill.

Mr. BORAH. I am quite aware that monopoly has run riot, and it was never so impudent in riotous extortions as it is at the present time, but I am not willing by reason of that fact to take print paper and put it under the control of the Government and compel every newspaper publisher in the country to go to the Government in order to get his paper and fix the price at which he shall get it.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If that was the purpose of my amendment I would be inclined to agree with the Senator. The purpose of the amendment is no such thing. We have the report of the Trade Commission that have had this particular matter under investigation something like two years, and indictments have been found against some. That does not meet the conditions in any particular. I am not willing and I do not think any Member of the Senate would be willing that the Government should seize and operate the manufacture of print paper in this country, but there is now a condition in this country where some sort of regulation of these extortions is to be made, and, believing that the suggestions of the Trade Commission meet it, I have not hesitated to offer the amendment.

Mr SHERMAN. Will the Senator yield for an inquiry?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I yield.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Government has the power proposed to be lodged in this bill, could they not refuse any paper desired?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I think very probably. That is a common danger of the grant of all powers at any time. If the Senator thinks that the proper way to meet the emergency and to place the country in a position where it can properly dispose of the great interests now committed to its care and placed under its control in this bill is to make an exception of print paper, which, of all commodities, is the one in connection with which the greatest extortion has been practiced on the people, he is welcome to that view. If the fear that power is going to be abused is an argument against this particular provision, it is likewise an argument against every single bill we have passed granting power to anybody. A democracy was never made to fight wars.

Mr. SHERMAN. I can not think, Mr. President, of a more complete press censorship or a more complete method of excluding from the mails than the power that would be given to the Government under this amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That is true. If you give the power to control it at all, that power can be scandalously abused; but if you do not give the power to control it at all, the people will be scandalously abused. We have got to trust somebody in an emergency like this. We are talking here as if we were sitting in a peaceful day and listening to the songs of birds. The guns are sounding; we have got to do something; and here this industry is the worst hampered in America.

Mr. BORAH rose.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If the Senator from Idaho will permit me to close the sentence, the Federal Trade Commission did nothing more than to make an effort to provide for an immediate distribution of the paper when manufactured, giving to every manufacturer of paper by agreement with them a fair profit, and to provide that the manufacturers, when they wanted it, got fuel, and to insure the distribution of the paper under an order of the railroads to carry it, thus permitting the paper to go to every part of the country. They have no inclination or desire, according to the report which has been made and which is, or should be, on the desks of Senators, that the Government should take any further control than that. There is no purpose that the Government should take any further control than that. If objections are made to commandeering this commodity to that extent—and, if you please, "commandeering" is perhaps an unfortunate word in this connection—why is not a similar objection raised to every single item mentioned in the section? Suppose the amendment had read "lumber and timber and their products," it would have caught every news print manufacturer in the United States just as much as does this amendment. The only difference is that my amendment leaves the matter open to no construction whatever, but construes it itself.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, does the Senator in charge of the bill desire to dispose of this amendment this afternoon?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Not if any Senator desires to have it discussed to-morrow at length. If the Senator from Idaho desires to discuss the amendment, I am perfectly willing to have it passed over.

Mr. BORAH. I think I will take a chance on having a vote taken on it, and then reserve the matter if it goes into the Senate.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is a good idea.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH].

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] to the amendment of the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] offers the following amendment: On page 2, line 4, at the end of the committee amendment, after the word "fertilizers," insert "and fertilizer ingredients."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment to the amendment. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, before a decision is made on this amendment I merely want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the conditions are now such that if there is anything that should be included under the provisions of this bill it is fertilizer ingredients. In the last 60 days the ingredients, which are absolutely essential to the production of food crops throughout the Atlantic seaboard, have advanced from 40 to 50 per cent. Those of you from the western part of the country, from the Middle West and the West, where you do not have to use fertilizer, can not understand the situation which exists on the entire North Atlantic and South Atlantic seaboard. We could produce there practically no crops at all without fertilizer. If you will take the statistics and read the vast sums which are expended yearly in any one of the South Atlantic States for fertilizer, you will appreciate the situation.

There are certain ingredients of fertilizers which we have to import. The prices of those ingredients have become almost prohibitive. There is hardly a reason for it. If there is anything which enters directly and intimately into food production and the conservation of food in this country, it is fertilizer and its ingredients. The mere item of potash has risen from $37 a ton to $500 a ton. That is on account of Germany being practically the only place where potash in commercial quantities can be obtained. Chile is the source of our nitrogenous element of fertilizer, which is the life of the plant itself. On account of the diversion of shipping to the cross-seas trade, from the South Atlantic trade, the price of that article has advanced from $45 to $100 a ton. The supply there is unlimited; it is easily available if the vessels were available. That is true of nearly every other ingredient.

Of course the unfortunate conditions that now confront the planters on the Atlantic seaboard are seized upon by those who are always ready to take advantage of an unfortunate situation to make an exorbitant profit.

I certainly do not think the Senate, when it is going to vote on this bill for the preservation of foodstuffs, is going to call upon the people to make bricks and then deny them the straw. If there is a single item in all this bill that strikes at the larger portion of the Coastal Plain, and now rapidly becoming necessary even in the western country, this is the item. I hope the Senate will put in the language "and fertilizer ingredients."

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do.

Mr. GRONNA. I rise to ask the Senator a question. I ask whether the ingredients to which he refers are products of this country or are products of foreign countries?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. They are largely the products of foreign countries.

Mr. GRONNA. If they are the products of foreign countries, could they be reached in this way? Could the prices be fixed by the Executive or by anybody else in this country?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I think so. I think the conditions are these: The transoceanic freight rates have gone very high, but there is no reason in the world why the rise of freight rates should be taken advantage of to double the price for the consumer; in other words, freight rates have not advanced on nitrates from Chile. I introduced a joint resolution in this body, which the Senate passed by a vote of 7 to 1, appropriating $10,000,000 for the purchase by this Government of nitrates in Chile and bringing them and selling them at cost to the farmers in this country. The price was then $70 a ton. That resolution went over to the other House. For some reason or other certain individuals saw fit that it should lie in the committee; and as soon as it was ascertained that the probabilities were that the joint resolution would not come out of committee, with the very same facilities for obtaining the nitrates which had existed before, the price advanced to $90 a ton.

Mr. GRONNA. I think the Senator from South Carolina knows that I realize, to a small extent at least, the importance of this question.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I think so.

Mr. GRONNA. And I therefore move to reconsider the vote——

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The vote has not been announced.

Mr. FLETCHER. No; the vote has not yet been announced. The Senator from South Carolina did not ask for a division.

Mr. GRONNA. If the vote has not been announced, I shall not make the suggestion.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I merely wanted to make this statement, because I am quite sure that my colleagues on the floor of the Senate, if they appreciated as acutely as I do the necessity for this article in the section from which I come, they would as generously vote for this amendment as I would if the conditions existed in their section of country as acutely as it does in mine.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I want to ask the Senator from South Carolina why the committee did not report that language in connection with this amendment relating to fertilizers?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. It was merely overlooked. The committee thought that the term "fertilizers" was sufficiently comprehensive; they did not understand that there were certain ingredients of fertilizers that are commercial articles.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Is not the Senator from South Carolina a member of the committee?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I am a member of the committee, but I overlooked it in this case, as the Senator, I suppose, has overlooked some things which he afterwards thought were very essential.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; but this is such a tremendously important matter, apparently, that I am surprised at it being overlooked. I do not believe that we ought to go back and include the ingredients of fertilizer. I think if we regulate the price of fertilizers that may be sufficient.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The matter of the ingredients of fertilizer was not suggested in committee. I think if it had been suggested the committee would not have opposed inserting the words "ingredients of fertilizer" as a part of the bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, before final action is taken I wish to say a word in support of this amendment; and will state that recently I had a letter, dated the 25th of June, from a constituent of mine which shows me conclusively that this is a very important amendment. Whether the general word "fertilizer" would cover it or not, I am not sure, but I think the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina ought to be adopted, because it makes plain and explicit what I think it likely the committee intended to provide for. This letter says:

> Two days ago I was informed by the E. O. Painter Fertilizer Co. that the price of sulphate of ammonia had been advanced to $135 a ton and nitrate of soda to $110. Also, that there was no steamed bone to be had and that dried blood had doubled in price since I last bought in March. They frankly told me that the outlook was so serious that they did not see how it was possible for Florida farmers to grow any crops this coming season. I was preparing to sow 10 acres in clover next month, having limed the land thoroughly and got it into good condition. Unless I can give the field a sufficient quantity of some sort of ammoniate I can not get the clover started in time to furnish pasturage for the hogs next winter.
> The outlook for thousands of your constituents who are truck farmers is even more serious, as at the prices quoted above it would be impossible to grow vegetables, and the orange groves would cease to bear fruit in paying quantities. It also means that the cotton crop next season would not amount to over 5,000,000 bales, and you know how serious the outlook is for the present crop when 25 cents is quoted for October cotton.

The suggestion is also made that the increase in the price of sulphate of ammonia has amounted to 50 per cent in the last few weeks. If these things are necessary in order that the people who produce the Nation's food may perform that function, why not make it possible to accomplish what they are willing to accomplish and want to accomplish? They must have this fertilizer. The word "fertilizer," as I have said, may be broad enough to cover the different elements or ingredients that enter into it; but it seems to me it ought to be made perfectly plain, so that there will be no question about it. The producers can not pay these prices. The men who have to produce the vegetables and the fruit and the things that the country needs can not do so if compelled to pay the prices that are now being exacted for these ingredients. I hope the Senate will permit the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina to be adopted.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate. It is so manifestly proper that the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina should be adopted that I do not see how there can be any difference of opinion about it. If it is necessary to include fertilizer in the section—and fertilizer is necessary to the production of anything like a full crop—it seems to me that the work begun should be completed. The Senator from Florida and the Senator from South Carolina have so completely covered the case that I simply wish to join with them in expressing the hope that the Senate will agree to the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator that a large number of farmers do not buy what is technically called fertilizer, but buy the ingredients and do their own mixing?

Mr. VARDAMAN. That is true.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, for one I am very glad that this amendment has been offered at this time. I am glad that the amendment offered by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] has also been thus early brought to our attention. I think it is wise for us to understand now that we are opening the door to practically everything, including clothing, boots and shoes, and hats and caps. I do not know what we will not include in the bill before we get through with it. I think we shall give it a very wide scope.

If we will take the bill as it came to us originally we shall find that it was formulated for the purpose of conserving grain——

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, he does not suggest, does he, that there is any connection whatever between news print paper and fertilizers, which are essential, a sine qua non, to the production of foodstuffs?

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I am not objecting to the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina, if we shall—and I presume we shall—conclude to broaden the scope of this bill so as to include practically everything. When the matter first came to my attention I said, "I am opposed to this kind of regulation until the President shall say that he needs it, that it is essential for the prosecution of the war," and when Mr. Hoover came before our committee and said that it was essential that we conserve the grain, and that we do it now, I said, "I am ready to support this bill."

Let me repeat, that as the bill came to us it was designed simply—> to assure an adequate supply and equitable distribution, and to facilitate the movement of foods, feeds, fuel.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. PAGE. Certainly.

Mr. STONE. The Senator said he was not disposed, as I understood him, to favor the provisions of this bill until he had been advised as to whether the President thought that the bill was necessary. Is that right?

Mr. PAGE. I say that whenever the President or the administration, those who have the conduct of the war in hand, say to me, "We want these powers given and believe that these powers are essential," I am ready to vote to grant them, but all the time with regret that we can not permit the natural laws of trade to continue to govern as they have governed in the past.

Mr. STONE. If the Senator please, the question I asked was whether he did not say that he looked, at least with great doubt if not with disfavor, upon such a vast power and awaited information as to whether the President thought these powers should be granted. Was not that the substance of what the Senator said?

Mr. PAGE. Substantially that. Unless the President or the administration assures me that the proper conduct of this war demands that these powers be given, I would prefer not to extend them.

Mr. STONE. Yes; that is what the Senator says. But he also said that Mr. Hoover came before his committee and stated that these powers were not only important but necessary.

Mr. PAGE. Essential.

Mr. STONE. Essential; and thereupon the Senator accepted that view expressed by Mr. Hoover. That is what I understood the Senator to say.

Now, Mr. President, the question I desired to ask the Senator was whether he, as a Senator, had any opinion about the matter or whether he yielded and surrendered any opinion he may have had about it to Mr. Hoover?

Mr. PAGE. I confess, Mr. President, that I am yielding my convictions to a considerable extent when I vote to vest the power over this great body of our commerce in the hands of any one man or any administration; but I feel loyal; I feel that if the President thinks that these powers are essential I am justified in pursuing a course I would otherwise naturally regret pursuing. I do not know that I can make myself more clear; but let me repeat, let me go back to where I was when the Senator from Missouri interrupted me. This bill originally was designed only—

To assure an adequate supply and equitable distribution and to facilitate the movement of foods, feeds, and fuel——

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Now, Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me——

Mr. PAGE. I should like to get through with this sentence, because I only got partly through with it when the Senator from Missouri interrupted me, and I should like to finish the thought, if the Senator will allow me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Vermont has the floor.

Mr. PAGE. Let me again state the situation: The Committee on Agriculture first broadened the scope of the bill by adding "petroleum and its products, steel and iron and their products, copper and its products, hemp, jute, and sisal and their products, lead, timber, lumber, farm implements and machinery, and fertilizers"; and now the proposals come from the Senators from South Carolina and Arizona that we broaden it still further by adding fertilizer ingredients and print paper and its products.

I probably shall vote for this bill with all its extensions, but I am glad that at the opening of the discussion as to amendments we meet the question and decide broadly whether we are to enter into this immense field and pass over to the President the regulation of practically the entire commerce of this country, or, conforming to his original suggestion, as shown by the House bill, authorize him to regulate only foods, feeds, and fuel.

I have no objection to the particular amendment of the Senator from South Carolina, and am not opposing it; I am merely saying that on general principles I regret exceedingly that we have broadened this field so widely.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Now, Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I desire to call his attention to the fact that he prefaced his remarks by saying that he reluctantly yielded to what was originally in the bill, and he read—and I hope Senators who have a copy of the bill will also observe—that the bill originally related to "foods, feeds, and fuel." I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the bill to which he has committed himself also contained the words "and articles required for their production." Fertilizers are articles required for their production.

Mr. PAGE. If the Senator desires to debate the amendment which he has offered, I have no objections; but, as for myself, I prefer not to do so, because I am not opposing it. I am simply expressing my great regret that at this time we find it necessary to enter into so broad a field, and I hope that now, before we proceed any further with this bill, we will determine whether we will adopt amendments calling for the inclusion of clothing, boots and shoes, and the combination of iron and wood, as suggested by the Senator from Iowa—indeed, whether we shall continue to broaden and still further broaden the field until we have included almost everything, or whether we shall, as nearly as we can, confine ourselves to the proposal of the administration, to provide only for the conservation of foods, feeds, and fuel and the articles required for their production.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. PAGE. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. In what I am about to say I want the Senator to understand that there is nothing personal. It happens that I know the Senator is engaged in the leather business.

Mr. PAGE. That is a mistake, Senator.

Mr. REED. Is that a mistake?

Mr. PAGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. REED. I thought the Senator was so engaged.

Mr. PAGE. I handle the raw materials—hides.

Mr. REED. In the hide business?

Mr. PAGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. REED. Well, that will do as well. The Senator, of course, is familiar with that business, and that is the reason I bring the question up. Those hides, of course, are tanned and enter into all forms of leather. Does the Senator do that kind of business?

Mr. PAGE. No, sir.

Mr. REED. The Senator sells to those who do?

Mr. PAGE. I do.

Mr. REED. And, of course, the Senator is familiar with that trade?

Mr. PAGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. REED. Now, does the Senator think that the prices which the farmer may receive for his grain ought to be controlled and regulated and at the same time the farmer be obliged to buy his leather in a market which is neither controlled nor regulated?

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, answering the question of the Senator from Missouri, I will say that if we are to carry his idea to its legitimate sequence, we must include everything that is manufactured from the needle up to the harvesting machine. If we are ready to do that, well and good. I should regret very much the necessity of entering the field so broadly as the Senator would suggest.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, that is the question I want to get the Senator to answer. Here is a farmer; he is a producer of grain; at the present time he sells that grain in the world markets. Bidding for it are all the people of Europe, Asia, and Africa, and of North and South America, speaking broadly; and that is speaking somewhat broadly. If we take away from him that open market where all these people bid each against the other for his product, in what kind of a position will we leave him if we deprive him of that market and yet compel him to buy everything that he consumes in a market where all the world is bidding against him? Is it not necessary, in order to keep from ruining the farmer, if we regulate his prices, to see that he is protected as to that which he must buy?

Mr. PAGE. May I ask the Senator a question before I answer his question? Does the Senator propose that we authorize the President, or the administration through the President, to fix the price upon all the merchandise and commodities that enter into human effort?

Mr. REED. If we make it upon that which the farmer produces, we must make it upon that which the farmer consumes, or we will ruin the farmer and we will stop the production of the very thing which must be produced in excessive quantities because it is now being consumed in excessive quantities.

Mr. PAGE. The Senator will confess, I presume, that in formulating this bill nothing was further from the purposes of the committee than to place the farmer in the position where he must submit to prices which some outside person might dictate. We certainly did not design to do that. We may have done so, and I know the Senator so believes, but I know we tried as best we could to relieve the farmer and the live-stock grower in this respect, so as not to permit anybody to wrong him. While I am not certain that the Senator is not right in saying that if we make a minimum price we make a maximum price also, at the same time I am not ready to confess that, and I hope it is not true.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I ask the Senator to consider this matter: At the present time the farmer raising a thousand bushels of wheat has bidding for that wheat all the neutral nations of Europe, all our allies, and also the American public. If this bill is passed and if other laws which we have enacted are enforced, to wit, the embargo act, the open market which now exists will be taken from the farmer, and he will be compelled to sell his product to one agent of the allies, who probably also will be the agent of this Government. Thus he will sell in a market that is absolutely controlled so far as his surplus is concerned. The European market will no longer be open to him, as it is now, but whatever sales he makes there he must make in accordance with the wishes and the mandate of one man. That, therefore, means, does it not, Senator, that the farmer's open market is gone and that it is within the power of this one individual practically to fix the farmer's price?

Mr. PAGE. If I thought that would be done, Mr. President, I should vote against this bill. I have no expectation that any such result will obtain.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I consider the Senator one of the fairest men in the Senate. I am going to try to convince him, by just the shortest kind of a statement, that that is the very purpose of this legislation.

The reason that we are to have a food control at all is to control the prices and keep down the maximum. Accordingly, it is proposed that the allies shall buy through one agent, no longer bidding against each other, and Mr. Hoover has already testified that that arrangement is made. Accordingly, the competition between the allies is already cut off.

Second, Mr. Hoover states that our Government intends to cooperate with that agency—which means, of course, that the supplies for our own Government will be bought in a manner not to compete with the allies.

Third, we have passed an embargo act which provides that nothing can be shipped except with the consent of the President; and it stands admitted—and I think was admitted by Mr. Hoover—that it is proposed to say to all of the neutral countries that, if they obtain anything in this country, they must buy in a manner not to compete with our allies or with us. Indeed, if you do not do that you do not control prices; and if you do not control prices you do nothing for the consumer, which is one of the objects of this bill.

Now, is it not perfectly plain that the very purpose of this bill is to control the maximum price that the farmer shall receive?

Mr. PAGE. If I believed that the purpose of this bill was to do injustice to the farmer, I would not vote for it; and I want to go further and say that Mr. Wilson is my President to-day. I expect to be loyal to him to the end of this fight. I do not believe he will consent to any injustice being done to the farmer; and to say that the purpose of this bill is to do injustice, it seems to me, is not warranted by the facts.

Mr. REED. I did not use the term "injustice." We are now making this bill, and we can not escape the responsibility of making it. I am talking about the effect of the bill, the power of the bill. We are putting in the hands of somebody the power to control the price the farmer is to get. I think the Senator now practically admits that. I am not saying it is going to be just or unjust——

Mr. PAGE. No; I do not confess it. It may be so. I do not deny it or confess it.

Mr. REED. Well, that is a good plea in a Federal court. It is called "nolo contendere." But what I now call the Senator's attention to is this:

Let us admit that everybody is going to try to be just; that the man who is going to administer this bill is going to try to be just. What I am trying to impress upon the Senator is that if you deny to the farmer the benefit of the competition of the world for that which he produces, you must give to him a protection against the competition of the world in that which he is to purchase. Otherwise, you will compel him to buy his fertilizer in a 600 per cent advanced market, while he sells his wheat in a market that has been artificially and by law circumscribed. So that if you cut down the price of his wheat, you must cut down the price of his fertilizer. If you do not do that now, no matter how patriotic this farmer is, he has got to quit his farm; and when he quits his farm, instead of America feeding the world, America may have trouble in feeding herself.

Now, I call the Senator's attention to this fact: The farmer is a consumer as well as a producer, and on the average he consumes just exactly as much as any other man. He has to have boots and shoes; and if you make him sell his wheat in a controlled market, you must give him his boots and shoes from that same market, so that he gets them equitably. He must have barbed wire for his fences. He must have agricultural implements to till his fields. He must have wagons. He must have harness. He must have groceries.

He must have sugar and tea and coffee. He must have everything that every ordinary person in the world has. Now, if you make him sell in a controlled market, must you not in the very nature of things give him the benefit of purchasing in that same controlled market, and put it all within one agency? Where can you stop?

Mr. PAGE. May I ask the Senator if he is—without any qualification—in favor of covering all of the necessaries of life by this bill and allowing Mr. Hoover, or anyone for him, to make the price?

Mr. REED. I am, if we pass the bill giving control of the farmer's product; then I shall insist up the other. But my own theory is, as the Senator would know if he had happened to be here when I was wearying the Senate with speeches that were entirely too long——

Mr. PAGE. I have been here a considerable part of the time.

Mr. REED. My own theory about the matter is that the thing to do is to get the speculator and attend to him wherever he exists, to get the hoarder and attend to him wherever he exists, and we have laws that govern that already; to give a control over the exchanges of the country so that all gambling can be taken out, and we have already passed that statute through the Senate, although it has not been accepted by the House. My theory, then, is that having done those things we should do everything possible to promote as large a production as we can, and that then we would have to protect our country against the suction of Europe—the term used by Mr. Hoover, and a very good one—and that that in itself is going to control the farmer's prices a good deal. It is a very dangerous power unless it is very carefully employed, but I am willing to give that, and my theory is that that is about all we can do. But if you enter upon the other theory, the theory of controlling these prices for the farmer and denying him a world market, you must protect him upon the other hand or you will ruin him; and when you ruin the farmer you will have killed the very thing that we are starting this legislation for, namely, the effort to produce a greater crop in the world.

I beg the Senator to think about this with his wise old head, that has thought out many a problem. How are you going to solve it in any other way?

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I have always admired in this life a man who had something to propose. The argument of the Senator from Missouri, as it appeals to me, is purely a negative one.

Mr. REED. Oh, no.

Mr. PAGE. He does not want to do this nor that. He simply says that this is a wrong or that is a wrong, but he suggests no remedy.

Mr. REED. Oh, if the Senator please, I hope he will not be unfair to me.

Mr. PAGE. I have listened very carefully to the Senator.

Mr. REED. I said I was willing to take the speculator and take him out of the business. That is one remedy. I was willing to give an absolute control of the exchanges of the country in order to cut out speculation. That is remedy No. 2. I was willing to pass laws, and had voted for and supported laws that passed this body, but not the other, that will get the man who hoards. That is remedy No. 3. I was willing now to give to the President the power to control the foreign markets through the embargo. We have already voted for that. That is remedy No. 4. I was willing to give, if it is necessary to have any law at all to do it, the power for this country and all the allies to buy through one agent. That is remedy No. 5. Those powers taken together, it seems to me, are complete within themselves and are as far as we can go with safety. That is what I say. I do not say we shall have no remedy. But then I am willing to go further than that and vote money to encourage production. I am willing to vote money in almost unlimited amounts to give Mr. Hoover or any other man the power to organize this country, to get all the good women to work and all the men to work to encourage production and encourage economies, and I think that is really a field where wonderful results can be obtained. I am willing to do all those things. Now, where do I stop short? I simply stop short at the point where it is proposed to turn over the business of the country to some one man.

Will the Senator let me, while I have the floor, call his attention and the attention of the Senate to the remark that I made a good many days ago, that if you put somebody in to run the business of the farmers of this country they would muss things up? You read in the papers the other day a glowing account of how they were going to send the Boy Scouts down into Virginia and Maryland to harvest the potato crop, and everybody was going to be happy, and the potatoes were going to roll into the market. You read in the morning paper now that the Boy Scouts—poor little fellows, gallant, splendid little fellows—have all had to come home. The thing fizzled out, just like every attempt to run the farms of this country by gentlemen who sit in swivel chairs has always been a failure, and it cost several hundred dollars to do this. Observe, again, how somebody took control of the potato market, and the result was that potatoes fell from $12 to $4 a barrel in one day's time, and the farmers quit digging them down here in Maryland and Virginia. I am told by a distinguished Senator this afternoon that he has word from his State that the farmers who ordinarily bring in their wheat at this time to the elevators and get some cash for it have been told by the elevator men that they will store their wheat, but will not buy their wheat. You just need a few more doctors like this to put the whole machinery of production out of gear—just a little bit more of it in this country.

Now I come back to my proposition. It is not fair to say that I have no remedies. I have suggested everything that a man can in reason claim here, unless he proposes to take the business out of the hands of the people and put it into somebody else's hands to manage for them. The man who does that in this country will bring ruin to this country. The thing that disgusts me this afternoon is that, when it is proposed to take over all of the business of the country in that way, Senators sit and vote for it, and newspapers support it; but when it was proposed to take over whisky—a thing in regard to which my position has always been well known; I have not been a prohibitionist—when it was proposed to lay the hand of power upon whisky and beer, these same papers that want to take over everything the farmer has, who have denounced as a demagogue every man who stood here to say a word for him, have thrown a hundred different kinds of fits, and have denounced Congress as composed of men unfit to legislate. It is a strange thing that it is so unconstitutional to lay the hand of power upon the corn or barley that is going to be turned into whisky or beer that any man who votes for it is a scoundrel and a wretch, and yet it is all right to lay the powerful arms of this Government upon the entire productive machinery of the land, and control every farmer's price.

Mr. PAGE. Has the Senator finished his question?

Mr. REED. Well, we have not been questioning each other. We have been having a sort of a running colloquy. I have finished my remark.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I have no desire to protract this discussion. I am not very much given to words anyway; but I am going to repeat just how I feel about this bill.

I approach it with regret—regret that we must do exactly what the Senator from Missouri says we are going to do, although I do not accept his statement as conveying my views as to the effect of the bill. I say that I shall probably vote for the bill. My regret grows out of the fact that I do not think the business interests of this country or the general success of this country will be best conserved by passing over our business interests to the care of any one man or any set of men. But when the President says, "I believe it is essential to the conduct of this war that we conserve the wheat of this country, and I have asked to have drawn a bill that gives my views upon this matter," and when he comes to us with the simple proposition that we are only to conserve foods, feeds, and fuels, I am inclined to support such a bill, because I feel that I want to support our President at this time. I am not going to believe that he is capable of doing the wrong or permitting the wrong to be done as suggested by the Senator from Missouri. I believe he is too patriotic not to conserve the interests of the farmer just as much as I would, representing a farming State as I do. I have no faith whatever in the idea that the farmer is going to be wronged; and any Senator who has read this bill will see that the committee, in formulating the measure, has tried its best to relieve the farmer from those matters connected with the bill which would interfere with his prosperity. He is not brought largely within the purview of this bill. In fact, he is especially relieved in plain language from many of its provisions and inhibitions.

Let me say in closing that I think I have accomplished what I designed to accomplish when I rose to speak upon this amendment of the Senator from South Carolina.

We are entering upon the consideration of this bill section by section, and at the very threshold I predict that we will find proposals to include not only all the articles that have been added by the committee, but boots and shoes and hats and caps and clothing and cotton goods. I do not know what we shall not include before we get through. It is the broadening of the bill, far beyond what the President expected or what he asked, that I do not approve of; and while I expect to vote for the bill if they are all included, I do not believe in them, and I want to express my protest against their inclusion.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat I should like to ask him if it was by the President's direction that petroleum and its products, steel and iron and their products, copper and its products, hemp, jute, and sisal and their products, lead, timber, lumber, farm implements and machinery, and fertilizers, were put in?

Mr. PAGE. Distinctly no, as I understand it, Mr. President. He has asked for nothing of the kind. These additions have come in by piecemeal. One Senator wanted to include oil; the Senator from South Carolina wanted to include fertilizers; another Senator wanted to include iron and steel and the products thereof.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, let me call the Senator's attention to this fact: The bill originally covered foods, feeds, and fuels, and the things necessary for their production; and that was a storm-center of discussion. Senators wanted to know what were the things necessary for their production, so that, in order to meet the demands which were made on the floor of the Senate and in the discussion, the necessaries were specified in the bill, and the general terms were stricken from the bill by the committee.

Mr. PAGE. But, as the Senator will remember, the argument that has just been made by the Senator from Missouri was made before our committee, to wit, that if we were to include the articles produced by the farmer we must broaden the scope of the bill and include the articles which he must buy. That may be necessary. I simply hope it will not be.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, then I understand from the Senator that foods, feeds, and fuels are the only articles actually asked for by the President; that is, in the bill as originally drawn?

Mr. PAGE. That is as I understand the matter, Mr. President.

Mr. BORAH. No; excuse me. It says "and articles required for their production."

Mr. PAGE. "And articles required for their production."

Mr. BORAH. Will somebody tell us what that means?

Mr. LODGE. That is broader than the Senate bill. I wanted to get at the things that were sacred and the things that were not in the Senator's mind; that is all. I do not see that there is any more objection to paper or hides than anything else.

Mr. SMOOT. Or cotton and cotton goods.

Mr. LODGE. Or cotton or cotton goods.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. PAGE. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I will ask the Senator if he does not think that in the preparation of the bill Congress, the Senators and the Representatives, should construct the bill rather than take orders from the President or some person whom he designates?

Mr. PAGE. I do.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Then it is not at all out of order that these Senators should have suggested the items in the bill to be under the control of the food dictator. I feel quite sure that the laws would be improved and more responsive to the needs of the people if the representatives of the people, instead of some bureau chief, would write the laws.

Mr. PAGE. It is not if it is the opinion of the Senate that that should be done. In that event, I offer no opposition except to say that I am sorry. I regret very much that it has been found necessary to do that.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Oh, I agree with the Senator that the bill is going to be disappointing in its results. It would be almost a miracle if such a law as this should be a success in a Republic; it is so at variance with the genius of free institutions. There are four provisions in the bill, however, that appeal to me. I believe in giving the food dictator or administrator the machinery by which he can bring about voluntary cooperation on the part of the housewives and the people of the country generally. That, I think, will accomplish some good and promote economy. Then, I think, the power which the bill gives to prevent hoarding of foodstuffs and the authority to exterminate the speculator is a wise provision. I think also the provision in the bill which prevents the use of grain for the manufacture of alcohol and prohibits the manufacture of beer and wine are excellent provisions. We need a sober as well as an economical people in time of war. I think temperance at this time would be a wise economy, improve the strength and health of the citizenry of the country, and save a great deal of money to the people. The fourth provision is the one designed to prevent these patriotic gentlemen who have made enormous fortunes out of the war from tendering their services without pay to the United States in the matter of conducting the war. I do not question anybody's patriotism, but the United States Government is able to pay for the services of its officers. I like these four provisions very much; there are other items or points of interest in the bill, but these, I think, are especially meritorious.

Mr. PAGE. May I ask the Senator, before he sits down, whether he is in favor of broadening the scope of this bill so as to include practically everything used in the human economy?

Mr. VARDAMAN. Well, there is this about that: If the Government is going to prescribe what the farmer's products shall sell for, it is but justice to enable the farmer to buy the goods that he uses in making his crops in a market that is controlled by the Government which controls the price of the things he sells. Now, I admit that we are engaged in a very difficult task, and I am afraid our work is going to be disappointing in its results. Really I do not think there is any question about that. I think the idea that this bill is a panacea for all the economic ills with which the country is now suffering borders on the absurd, and I think it is going to fall far short of what its authors expect it to accomplish; I am in accord with the Senator on that. But under the circumstances I am inclined to resolve in its favor and give it a trial. I would have preferred that it be limited in its scope, as I said a moment ago; that the food administrator should be permitted to use this small sum of $150,000,000 to organize the farmers, the housewives, and the people generally, and get them all to consent to economize. That would accomplish something, I am sure. But I doubt, really, if the country will save as much from the operation of the law as it will cost to administer it.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I want to say only a word more. I believe that if it is possible to do it, we ought to amend the bill so that the injury to the farmer which is pointed out by the Senator from Missouri can not result, and then do what we know we ought to do, and that is to clean the slate as to regulating the general business of the country. When we say that Mr. Hoover is capable of handling the question of grain, we base it upon the supposition that he has had large experience in handling grain in Europe and that he knows what he is talking about. I for one want to say that I am very much impressed with the clearness with which he explained the grain situation, but I do not believe he is any better prepared to go ahead and govern, regulate, and take charge of all the business interests of this country than 50 or more Senators upon this floor, and I do not believe we are wise in trying to place that broad general power in his hands. Because the President does not ask it, because he has not suggested it, because I do not believe it is necessary, I hope that at the very entrance upon the discussion of this bill instead of enlarging its boundaries and phylacteries we shall reduce them, and confine ourselves as nearly as we may to those commodities in the bill which the President says it is necessary to regulate in order that he may vigorously and properly conduct this war.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, there has been a discussion here this afternoon of the earth and the fullness thereof, and it might be well to refer to the identical point that is before the Senate. It is simply a proposal to insert three words, and those three words are "and their ingredients." Ingredients of what? Of fertilizers. To say that the President should not have control over the ingredients, when as a matter of fact he has control of the subject matter—the fertilizers—seems to me to be absurd.

It may be that the principal cause of the high price of the fertilizers is due to the fact that one of the ingredients is sold at such an enormous price, or is the subject of a trust, or is controlled in such a way that it can not be obtained without the exercise of some power upon the part of the President. For that reason, it seems to me that when we say we are going to give this power over to fertilizers, and yet we will not give it over the ingredients that make up the fertilizers, it is an absurd proposition.

Fertilizers, of course, are necessary to the products of the farm. They are necessary to the production of the very food that is provided for in this bill. Is it possible that we are to have control of the food but not have control of those things which create the food? Why, it seems to me that the mere statement of the proposition is sufficient to carry this amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question before he takes his seat. Evidently, from what the Senator says, he is in favor of including all of the other products in the bill placed there as amendments by the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. Does the Senator think it is fair to give absolute control over copper and its products, we will say, or lead and its products, when not to exceed one-hundredth of 1 per cent of the copper produced in this country is used in either the production of food, feed, or fuel? I am sure that I am within reason when I say not to exceed one-hundredth of 1 per cent.

Mr. SHAFROTH. There is not any question but that the bill gives great power, and it gives great power not only as to food but as to other things, and if you are going to prosecute the war successfully you have got to extend it to other things. There is no field in which you can extend it with better results for the successful termination of the war than to put that control over lead and copper. It may not be on the theory of conserving food, and it may be that it ought to have been referred to another committee, and perhaps there ought to be another report from another committee with relation to it, but notwithstanding Congress has the power to determine these matters, and that power is necessary to be exercised when it comes to the question of a successful termination of the war.

Mr. SMOOT. I was not discussing the question as to the advisability of giving control over foods, feed, and fuel at this time; but if we are going to control all the copper with hardly any of the production of the country used in the production of food, feed, and fuel, why did not the committee go further and include every product manufactured or grown in this country? Why did not the committee include wool and the products of wool? Why did it not include cotton and the products of cotton? Because, of those two items, the farmer purchases $10 worth where he does $1 of copper; yes, he purchases $100 worth where he purchases but $1, and with lead the percentage is even greater. If the committee wanted copper and lead and similar products controlled, and it evidently did, why did they not include all the production of the country?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, you can easily put the question as to why anything that was not done was not done, but as a matter of fact these were the suggestions that were presented to the committee and they seemed to strike the mind of the committee. If the Senator wants anything added, he has a perfect right now in his individual capacity as a Senator to present it and move that such items as he wants to have included be included.

Mr. SMOOT. I know I have that right as an individual Senator, but I wish to say to the Senator that he knows if any Senator now offers an amendment to the bill, not a committee amendment, when the committee is a unit in reporting the bill, as is the case with this bill, I understand there would be little chance of getting a favorable vote upon it in the Senate.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not think so. I think you would get a favorable report in any instance that presented a strong case.

Mr. SMOOT. I said a favorable vote.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; or a favorable vote.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator allow me one moment to present two amendments to the pending bill for printing? That is all. I thank you.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments will lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Colorado has a great deal more faith than I have, and I base my faith upon the experience I have had here for some fourteen-odd years. When a motion is made to amend a committee amendment there are but very few Senators that hear the discussion and the reasons for the amendment, and when the bell rings for a vote they come in from the cloakroom or from their offices and ask whether it is a committee amendment or not; and there is little chance to get a majority vote to include an item other than one reported by the committee.

Mr. THOMAS. I should like to ask the Senator from Utah if he thinks there is any probability of the bell ringing for a vote very soon? [Laughter.]

Mr. SMOOT. I may say to the Senator that I am quite sure it will not be until some time next week.

Mr. THOMAS. I should like very much to hear it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, it seems to me the criticism which the Senator from Utah has made should have some force and effect relative to the procedure of the Senate, but I am sure the Senate believes that this enlarged field should be included; and I have not any doubt, no matter what the attitude of the committee might be, the Senate would approve any measure enlarging the bill that was in the belief of Senators to the best interests of the country.

Mr. SMOOT. I say now, without fear of contradiction, that if there is any reason for copper and lead to be included in the bill there are a hundred reasons why it should also include wool and its products, cotton and its products, and other items that the farmers of the country are compelled to purchase.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Then why not include wool and its products and cotton and its products if they are necessary?

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will wait just a moment, I was going to add that I think before the bill is passed some Senator should move to include wool and its products, cotton and its products, and leather and its products. These three items the farmer is certainly interested in.

Mr. GRONNA. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. As a member of the committee I want to assure the Senator that there are members of the committee who would be glad to vote with the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Then with that slight assurance from the Senator I will say no more, but bide the time when I can offer such an amendment.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Whenever the question arises as to whether one of the commodities that has been referred to by the Senator shall be included then is the time to discuss it, but what is before us now is whether or not we should include ingredients in addition to fertilizers, and inasmuch as we have already inserted "fertilizers" it seems to me there should be no objection to including ingredients.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I very much hope that the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina will not be adopted. It is not because I am not in favor of cheap fertilizers, because I am. I voted very gladly for the Senator's proposition for a nitrate plant. But the trouble is that the bill will become loaded if we once start by inserting an amendment of this nature. There is no logical distinction to be drawn between fertilizers and their ingredients in the bill. If you put in the ingredients of fertilizers, there is no reason why you should not put in wool and its products and cotton and its products, and so on. We have got to have a practical result here in order to get the bill through.

The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry worked over the bill and came to an agreement. I do not think it is the logical result. I do not think it is symmetrical. I do not think it is just, if you come to do exact justice; but they have reached a result. There is nothing that I want to control more than news-print paper. But the Senator from Arizona offers an amendment to include news-print paper. It was rejected by the Senate, and it is very fortunate that it was. If that had been accepted, we all would have had to vote for these other amendments as fast as they came.

The Senate will remember that not so long ago we tried to do something in the way of warehouse receipts for the bankers. That was agreeable to a majority of the Senate; but some one moved to add naval stores, and that was added; and then grain was added; and not only canned salmon was added but the measure was loaded down so that nobody could vote for it, and it was laughed out on the floor of the Senate. I want to warn the friends of this measure that if we once start putting on even as meritorious an item as the ingredients of fertilizers there will be no end to it and the bill will be killed in the Senate.

I feel free to say this because I have been a friend of the farmers. I was glad to do what I could for them, and I have been glad to aid them on every measure that comes before the Senate. But I do appeal to my friend, the Senator from South Carolina, not to kill this legislation, for if he once sets this ball rolling it will roll out of the Senate and we shall get no results.

Mr. GRONNA. I wish to ask the Senator a question before he takes his seat: Does not the Senator think the bill as it came from the House is much broader and has much wider scope than the measure which was reported by the committee to the Senate?

Mr. HOLLIS. I think it was very broad in its scope. I think it would have been better for the passage of the bill if it had been left as it was, perhaps; but I want to take it as we have it from the committee. Great good will come from it, but if we load it down we will not get it through, and no good will come from it. I will admit that this is a very poor classification. It might be infinitely better. The trouble is that no two of us would agree as to what the list should include, and we had better take what the committee has reported to us and put it through, and not fool around with amendments, trying to include one thing and then another.

Mr. GRONNA. I wish to remind the Senator of the provision on page 1 of the bill as it came from the House. I read from line 6:

> To assure an adequate supply and equitable distribution, and to facilitate the movement of foods, feeds, fuel, and articles required for their production.

The Senator knows all these articles are required for production. I hope there is no Senator who does not fully realize that not only the articles enumerated by the committee are required but all the articles mentioned in the discussion here this afternoon are required for the production of food.

Mr. HOLLIS. I am inclined to take the Senator's view of it, but some one else might not, and on a reexamination I might change my mind. I think I would rather leave it where it was originally, but here it is. This is what the committee have done. It is an imperfect result, but it is their result. It is the best they could do under the circumstances, and I think it should be passed. I think the friends of the measure ought to protect the bill now, imperfect as it may be.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. SHAFROTH. When the committee, as manifested by a number of the members, say they are in favor of this amendment, the chairman himself stating so and the next ranking member of the committee stating so, should it not be an indication that "ingredients of fertilizers" should be included as the action of the committee?

Mr. HOLLIS. No; it indicates that some tried to get it on in committee and could not carry a majority of the committee with them. I am not a member of the committee; I do not know what was said there, but I draw that inference from the action of the committee.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, the Senator from New Hampshire has no right to make that remark, because the chairman of the committee states that the word "ingredients" was not mentioned in the committee, and had it been it is his opinion that it would have been included. The Senator has taken the position, if he will allow me, that we are going to load down the bill with extraneous matter. There are peculiar conditions and circumstances about the fertilizer question. As remarked by the Senator from Georgia, there are different ingredients that are bought by the farmer, and to control the thing known commercially as fertilizer you must control its ingredients.

It is hardly necessary for me to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that fertilizers are composed principally of three ingredients—potash, nitrogen, and phosphoric acid. These ingredients are used otherwise, but principally they are used for fertilizers. The companies get together and have mixing plants. They organize a mixing plant. They produce what is called a complete fertilizer. The farmers have learned to mix it themselves to save expense. I plead for what in my State alone costs upward of $50,000,000 annually in order to produce that on which the population depends and to ship a surplus. The price of those ingredients rises in value necessarily with the things produced. Of the different ingredients potash has risen from $77 a ton to $500 a ton, nitrate of soda from $45 a ton to $110 a ton, and so with sulphate of ammonia and other ingredients which are just as essential as coal in an engine; and when I stand here and plead that this very lifeblood of agriculture in my State shall be preserved, then the remark is made that we are loading down the bill with nonessentials.

Mr. SMOOT. May I ask the Senator a question? Does not every item the Senator has already mentioned go into commercial fertilizer and is it not fertilizer of itself?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. No; not complete. In nearly all fertilizers you have 7:3:3, 8:4:4, 5:4:4, or 7:4:4. It is the way you combine it. None is complete in itself.

Mr. SMOOT. What I want to say to the Senator is this: There is not an ingredient that goes into commercial fertilizer that is placed upon the market, but that in and of itself is a fertilizer.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I will say to the Senator that fertilizers——

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I think I will decline to yield further. I wish to answer the question addressed to me by the Senator from South Carolina by saying that his argument is unanswerable, and I think we should take warning. The Senator is upon the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. He is an important member of it. He had a chance to present this matter in the committee. He either tried to get it on or he did not. The committee acted after days and days of consideration.

Now, other Senators can get up and make just as good an argument for 40 other items that might be put in the bill, and if you put 40 other items in the bill it will not pass, in my opinion. That is my answer to it. I get up and take this unpopular attitude because I have been a friend of the farmers and because I know that as far as the farmers take any interest in the question, they know I have not any ax to grind on the bill, and I do not believe it will pass if we begin to add items of this kind.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield. I yield the floor.

Mr. GORE. I wish to say on behalf of my friends from South Carolina that the entire Committee on Agriculture reconsidered the bill in great haste—I think too great haste—but we were under whip and spur, and I may say that no motion was made to include the ingredients of fertilizer. Perhaps if we had had more time for deliberation it would have been included. The ingredients of fertilizer undoubtedly ought to have been included, and I think it would seriously impair the symmetry of the bill if they are not included.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] described to us the original condition of the bill and the peculiar value which he attaches to the original clauses asked for by the President, and I think that is a sound distinction. The original bill as it came from the House and I suppose, as the Senator from Vermont indicated, also from the President, provided for "foods, feeds, fuel, and articles required for their production." The other items were inserted by the Senate committee. I have great respect for their view, but I do not think that gives their amendment added sanctity. I think each one of us is just as much entitled to suggest an additional article to be taken possession of by the Government as a member of the Agricultural Committee.

The purpose declared of this bill is that it is essential for the successful prosecution of the war "to assure an adequate supply and equitable distribution and to facilitate the movement of foods, feeds, and containers therefor," and then follows the list added by the committee.

Cotton in itself is one of the bases of explosives. There are very few articles produced which are so important in the manufacture of munitions. From cotton are also made shirts that the farmer wears and the material from which his wife and his children are clothed. Cotton relates to most subjects.

Hides and skins and their products are intimately related with the shoeing of the Army. Can anything be more important to the welfare of our armies than to have them properly shod? There is hardly one thing in the world that is more important than that.

Then from wool and its products the clothing for the Army is made. We are making the cloth now by the thousands of yards.

Those things are just as important to the conduct of this war and ought to be just as much controlled by the Government as steel and iron and sisal and hemp. There is no reason why those things should not be taken possession of by the Government. Let us either stick to what the administration asks us to do, or else let us enlarge the bill according to the dictates of common sense. The opinions of all the Senators are as good as those of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSON of California in the chair). The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, it may be that a number of the additions put into this section by the Senate committee ought to go out, but one certainly bears upon the main proposition of foodstuffs, and that is fertilizer and the ingredients which make fertilizer. Those two items apply directly to the production of foodstuffs, and are logically a part of foodstuff production and conservation.

We know that the markets are in a condition where possibly the aid of the Government may be necessary to put the ingredients required for fertilizer within the reach of the farmers, in order that the volume of foodstuffs may be increased. Let the criticism go on about steel and petroleum and the other items; let the argument go on to add wool and cotton and all the products of wool and cotton and all the manufacturing plants that produce those products; but let us, at least, not forget that fertilizer and fertilizer ingredients stand entirely upon a different basis. They are the foundation for the production of foodstuffs; they are legitimately and logically a part of the bill. They were included in the original bill in the language the committee struck out—"necessaries for the production of foodstuffs." We struck that broad language out and put in more limited language.

So, I hope that Senators will not be swept away either by objections to some of these heavier items that were added by the committee or by objections for fear that wool, cotton, and other products, together with the plants that manufacture them, may be added to the bill. Let us at least take care of foodstuffs, which require also that we should take care of fertilizer and fertilizer ingredients.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by G. F. Turner, one of its clerks, announced that the House insists upon its amendment to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 13) extending the time within which the "Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to issue temporary permits for additional diversions of water from the Niagara River" shall remain in effect, disagreed to by the Senate, agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. FLOOD, Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas, and Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin managers of the conference on the part of the House.

WITHDRAWAL.

Executive nomination withdrawn June 29 (legislative day of June 28), 1917.

Capt. Campbell E. Babcock, Infantry.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, June 29, 1917.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord God, our Heavenly Father, without whom nothing is strong, nothing holy, increase our faith and confidence in Thee; that Thou being our counsel and guide, we may fulfill to the uttermost the obligations of the hour; and Thine be the praise, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2482. An act to reinstate Armor S. Heffley as a second lieutenant in the United States Marine Corps; and

S. 2434. An act authorizing the counties of Cass and Itasca, Minn., to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River between said counties.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries.

PICKETING OF WHITE HOUSE.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a telegram from the Equal Suffrage Club of my home city.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner stated. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, in my time I ask that the following telegram and letter be read, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

[Telegram.]

NATCHITOCHES, LA., June 28.

Hon. JAMES B. ASWELL,
Washington, D. C.:

The members of the Natchitoches Equal Suffrage Club, composed mostly of women, request you to convey to the President their sincere regret at the annoyance and embarrassment to which he is being subjected by the misdirected zeal of a few women suffragists, whose ill-timed activities in picketing the White House grounds and displaying banners denying the democracy of our Government they deeply deplore as hurtful to the cause of woman suffrage, as disloyal to our country in its hour of supreme peril, and as uselessly increasing the cares of a man on whom and on whose serenity of mind the welfare of the world at this critical time so largely depends.

NATCHITOCHES EQUAL SUFFRAGE CLUB,
By ROBERTA NEWELL, President.

JUNE 29, 1917.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I take pleasure in handing you herewith a telegram from the Equal Suffrage Club of my home city, Natchitoches, La., signed by Miss Roberta Newell, president of the club.

Permit me to add my most cordial approval of the sentiments therein expressed.

Sincerely, yours, J. B. ASWELL.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. SCOTT of Iowa for 15 days, on account of important business.

FRANK FUNKHOUSER.

Mr. PARK. Mr. Speaker, I call up House resolution 108, a privileged report (No. 90) from the Committee on Accounts, which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 108.

Resolved, That there shall be paid, out of the contingent fund of the House, the sum of $500 to Frank Funkhouser for clerical services rendered as clerk of the Committee on Mileage.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, is this a unanimous report from the Committee on Accounts?

Mr. PARK. All but one member were present, and we could not get him.

Mr. GILLETT. Were some members of the minority present?

Mr. PARK. Yes; three of them were. Only one member was not present.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be again reported.

There being no objection, the Clerk again reported the resolution.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is not this an exceptional procedure, so far as the clerk of this committee is concerned?

Mr. PARK. In what respect?

Mr. STAFFORD. Is he not receiving a regular salary as clerk of that committee?

Mr. PARK. No; there is no clerk to that committee—no session clerk.

Mr. DILL. There is no session clerk for the Committee on Mileage, and it has been customary for the clerk of this committee to receive this allowance. He does the work, of course, and I rely upon his figuring. His figuring it out and my certification is all that there is.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not recall at any time when we have authorized a special amount to be paid to the clerk of the Committee on Mileage.

Mr. DILL. I am told that it has been done every year. Last year the same resolution was passed.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is the first time that I ever heard of it, and that is confirmed by other Members. I ask that the matter go over until further consideration can be given it.

The SPEAKER. It is a privileged resolution.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the matter go over for the time being until further consideration can be given it.

Mr. PARK. I object to that.

Mr. STAFFORD. I hope the gentleman will not force a call of the House.

Mr. PARK. I withdraw the resolution temporarily, Mr. Speaker.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a very brief editorial from a Richmond (Va.) newspaper, touching the matter referred to in the telegram just read from the desk, submitted by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing therein an editorial. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

ARMY MEDICAL CORPS.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for not to exceed two minutes to explain a statement in the RECORD of last Monday with reference to promotions in the Medical Corps.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, on last Monday when the bill regulating promotions in the Medical Corps was being considered, in reply to a question asked by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD], I am made to state that the highest office in the Medical Reserve Corps is that of a first lieutenant, whereas, as a matter of fact, it is a major. I thought the question was directed to the Medical Corps of the Regular Army and the Medical Corps of the National Guard. It was to correct the inequalities between the Medical Reserve Corps and the Medical Corps of the Regular Army, and particularly the National Guard, that the bill was submitted by the Committee on Military Affairs. In other words, the Medical Corps in the Regular Army and in the National Guard have to have five years' previous service but for this bill before they could get promotion, whereas in the Medical Reserve Corps a man could be appointed a major or a captain, as the case may be, without any previous service. I wish to make this statement so as to correct any misunderstanding that might result from what appears in the RECORD of last Monday.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill known as the trading-with-the-enemy bill, H. R. 4960, be made a special order on Monday, July 9, and a continuing order thereafter. This will enable us, I will say to the House, to take this coming week and adjourn either to-night or to-morrow over until Tuesday and then from Tuesday to Friday and Friday to Monday. After we have finished the consideration of this present bill, which will not take very long, and the Niagara Falls bill, which we can finish, I think, to-day, we can adjourn over by unanimous consent until Tuesday and then from Tuesday until Friday and then from Friday until Monday, when we will take up the trading-with-the-enemy bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That will be the understanding, that we have no business on Tuesday or Friday?

Mr. KITCHIN. None at all; no business except the reading of the Journal and adjournment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Allow me to ask right there——

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, let me suggest to the gentleman from North Carolina there is a probability, and it may be a possibility, that a conference report can be had on the bill which is now on the Speaker's table, H. R. 4188, and there may be a possibility of having one on the other food bill.

Mr. GILLETT. What bill is that?

Mr. LEVER. The first food bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. That is the reason I am making this request, because there is nothing but a possibility or probability of the Senate returning the food-control bill the coming week, and we do not want to sit the whole of next week waiting for the Senate. In the middle of the week comes the Fourth of July, and many gentlemen wish to be away then, to leave on Tuesday and return on Thursday, if any went. I do not think there is any probability, though some may think so—I hardly think it is a possibility—for the Senate to finish the food-control bill next week. Why keep all the House here a whole week waiting? We can have an understanding that nothing will be done during the week except to meet and adjourn for three days at a time until Monday week.

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman will yield for one minute, I want to emphasize the importance of understanding absolutely that nothing will be done except what is stated, because if Members go away under a gentlemen's agreement and a handful come here and somebody gets up a little insignificant thing and asks unanimous consent it ought not to be allowed.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think every man will be committed in honor to stand by this understanding that nothing will be done next week except to meet and adjourn over.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There will be no quorum here then to do business until the 9th?

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. CRAMTON. In the event a report should come in in connection with the food bill prior to the 9th, what would be done with it?

Mr. KITCHIN. It will remain on the Speaker's table until the 9th, and then be disposed of.

Mr. CRAMTON. We might be kept here another week or two in regard to these various other bills, whereas we might as well be working on something this coming week—that is, the trading-with-the-enemy bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think it will be better to take it upon a day certain, because you can not take it up except by unanimous consent or by a rule, and there is objection to it now. We do not wish to get a rule for its consideration. The House needs to be in no special hurry about it now, as the Senate could not consider it, perhaps, within a month.

Mr. CRAMTON. We will have the result of being kept here and doing nothing unless the food bills come in.

Mr. KITCHIN. On Monday week we will begin on this bill. If the food bill comes in in the meantime, we will, on Monday, the 9th of July, the first thing, send it to conference, and when we dispose of the food bill and the trading-with-the-enemy bill we will have another gentlemen's agreement until the Senate returns the revenue bill, which will be some two weeks, or possibly three weeks, thereafter. Then while the conferees are getting together on the revenue bill all the other bills and confrence reports can be passed. There will probably be a week or two of conference on the revenue bill.

Mr. CRAMTON. The result would be, it seems to me, a waste of time——

Mr. KITCHIN. No; it saves time; and another thing I think we do. The country knows the House is up with all its work and we are waiting on the Senate, and it may occur to the Senate or some Senators that they ought to do some business, and it might have a tendency to inspire them just to hurry up matters.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. DYER. I understand that there is a real substantial belief that the food-control bill will be through the Senate by Monday.

Mr. KITCHIN. This coming Monday?

Mr. DYER. They are getting ready to read it to-morrow morning——

Mr. KITCHIN. If the gentleman believes that, he is the most credulous gentleman I ever heard of.

Mr. DYER. I think we ought to stay here next week.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from North Carolina yield for a suggestion?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. LEVER. I have just been notified by a friend of mine in the Senate that the Senate has overwhelmingly voted down the motion to recommit the food bill.

Now, my judgment is that the Senate will pass the food bill by Tuesday night. I may be entirely mistaken about it, but I wanted to call the gentleman's attention particularly to the necessity for haste in connection with the bill that is now on the Speaker's table—the first food bill—the matter just coming to my attention this morning.

Mr. KITCHIN. Possibly that can go to conference now.

Mr. LEVER. If we might know that we would have a quorum here on Tuesday of next week, I think the question can easily be disposed of.

Mr. KITCHIN. I doubt if we can have a quorum, because most of the gentlemen have made engagements, a great many of them, for the Fourth of July.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And Tuesday is the day before the Fourth.

Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I think the suggestion that the gentleman has made is a wise one; for one reason, that many Members of the House, on both sides, have understood since the first of this week that such an agreement was to be made. It was fairly stated, as we all know, and a great many have gone away on the strength of that. I wondered if it could not be arranged in some way, recognizing the haste about the food bill, that if the food bill came over here by Tuesday, as the gentleman thinks, although I do not agree with him in his expectations, it could not be understood that under those circumstances, as the House will come back on Friday, that there might be the conditional agreement so that we might take it up on Friday instead of the following Monday.

Mr. LEVER. Would the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] have this agreement, that if the food bill does come to the House next week we may enter into an agreement now that we shall disagree to all the Senate amendments and ask for a conference?

Mr. KITCHIN. I would gladly agree to that, but I understand the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] might not agree to it.

Mr. LENROOT. If the gentleman will yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. Might not this understanding be had, that if the food bill does come back the request for unanimous consent be made that it go to conference, and if it be objected to, of course it would not be taken up until we come back?

Mr. KITCHIN. I would like to see that agreement made, but I understand the gentleman from Kentucky is opposed to it.

Mr. BARKLEY. I would not like to agree to anything in reference to the food bill without knowing in advance what is going to be in it when it came back.

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman would not have objection now to the making of a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not know that it would be necessary to get unanimous consent to object.

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman's agreement, as stated, would not permit even a request for unanimous consent. My only point was that should not apply to a request for unanimous consent, but that if this bill comes back the gentleman should have full opportunity to object.

Mr. BARKLEY. I would not enter into any agreement that would preclude me from objecting——

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly not.

Mr. KITCHIN. You can object at that time.

Mr. BARKLEY (continuing). Or to offer any preferential motion that might be in order in reference to the bill.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. I would not want to make any agreement, from what I see of the Senate's addition to the food bill.

There are a good many things that they have put on there that I want to move to concur in, and I want to have the opportunity of making the motion.

Mr. KITCHIN. My friend from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] is an optimist as to the action of the Senate, and so is my friend from Missouri [Mr. DYER]. We need not expect the Senate to send this bill back here next week. They are going to take the Fourth of July also, I presume.

Mr. DYER. I would like to ask the gentleman how long we will likely be in session to-day?

Mr. KITCHIN. I would say we would get through the pending bill here in an hour.

Mr. ADAMSON. And probably in 30 minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. My judgment is we will lose no time, but make time, by consenting to the unanimous-consent request that I have made.

Mr. BORLAND. It is proposed to start in on the trading-with-the-enemy bill this week?

Mr. KITCHIN. My request is to put it off until July 9, as we can not get unanimous consent to consider it now. That is satisfactory to the committee. The committee considered the matter and thought this the wise arrangement.

Mr. CRAMTON. Is it the understanding that, in the event this request is granted, following these matters of to-day and to-morrow there will be nothing whatever taken up except conference reports and the trading-with-the-enemy bill?

Mr. KITCHIN. Nothing will be taken up next week.

Mr. CRAMTON. And the week of July 9 you are not going to start in with a new grist of legislation?

Mr. KITCHIN. No. I think that would end it. Of course the aeronautics bill would come along later, but that would be all. That would end up the program.

Mr. CRAMTON. Nothing would be taken up anew except the bill concerning trading with the enemy?

Mr. KITCHIN. No; nothing except the bill respecting trading with the enemy, in addition to these two measures that have been referred to to-day. That is my understanding.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] asks unanimous consent that after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of the business on the Speaker's table on the 9th day of July House bill 4960, in relation to trading with the enemy, shall be in order and remain the continuing order until it is completed——

Mr. KITCHIN. Not to interfere with conference reports——

Mr. DILLON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Not to interfere with conference reports, revenue bills, and appropriation bills.

Mr. DILLON. Can the gentleman give us any information as to when he expects to secure a final adjournment?

Mr. KITCHIN. Well, I think we ought to get a final adjournment by the 15th of August.

Mr. LANGLEY. Or at any rate by September 15.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. LEVER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, there is on the Speaker's table a House bill with Senate amendments. I do not think that the conditions existing between the two bodies are such that we can not easily come to an agreement very quickly. The only thing that troubles me now is that members of the Committee on Agriculture of the Senate are engaged on the floor of the Senate. But I would like, if I possibly could, to enter into an agreement that if this conference report should be brought back to the House by Monday or Tuesday of next week it might be disposed of, because I am satisfied that there are no real differences that we can not work out.

Mr. KITCHIN. As I said awhile ago, another reason why we need not hurry about the trading-with-the-enemy bill is that, even if you pass it next week, the Senate will probably not be able to reach its consideration within three or four weeks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SIMS. That has reference to the fixing of the time?

The SPEAKER. Yes; that has reference to that one thing. All the rest of this talk is futile.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I will object to any unanimous consent until action is taken on that food-survey bill with the amendments of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from Arkansas seeking to object to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. WINGO. If the gentleman will couple with that the consideration of this matter next, I shall not object.

Mr. KITCHIN. This does not interfere with conference reports.

Mr. WINGO. Here is the situation: This House has been rawhided by Members of the Senate—at least one of them—each day, and by the newspapers of the country also, for failure to take up this proposition.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can take it up in half a minute.

Mr. KITCHIN. Half a minute after the disposition of this. It does not exclude that. The gentleman can make his motion immediately.

Mr. WINGO. With the understanding that that is to be taken up and disposed of, I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina that this trading-with-the-enemy bill be considered on the 9th day of July after the reading of the Journal, and so forth, not to interfere with conference reports?

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I want to know if it is agreed now that this other matter can be taken up. Objection has been made to the consideration of it. One objection has been able to knock it out heretofore. I want to know if it is to be agreed to take it up.

The SPEAKER. The only way to find out in that state of mind is for the gentleman from North Carolina to withdraw his unanimous-consent request and try it on.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes. I will withdraw it, and renew it right off.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 4188, with Senate amendments, disagree to all the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House bill 4188, disagree to all the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference. Is there objection?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, there is one amendment put on by the Senate that I desire to move to concur in. That is the antihoarding proposition. I have not the number of it.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman refers to the Nelson amendment, does he not?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. I refer to the Nelson amendment.

Mr. LEVER. I do not happen to have the bill as amended by the Senate in my files, but I will say that the bill pending in the Senate that passed in this House by an overwhelming vote on Saturday night contains an antihoarding section that is better drawn and more effective than the section the gentleman calls attention to. If at this time he wants to test the House on that proposition, I am willing to arrange some time for debate.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. I do not care for debate, but I want to make a motion that we concur in that Senate amendment.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Further reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from South Carolina can assure me that the antihoarding proposition will be retained in the other bill——

Mr. KITCHIN. A vote can be given on it. That will be all right——

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. I will agree right now.

Mr. LEVER. Yes. I am as strongly for the antihoarding proposition as the gentleman is.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FERRIS. Reserving the right to object—which I do not intend to do—I want to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to some very far-reaching amendments that have been put on this bill with reference to public lands, including the so-called Fall amendment. Will the gentleman yield to me two or three minutes?

Mr. LEVER. I have no time myself.

Mr. FERRIS. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to proceed for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FERRIS. On December 31 last the Congress passed the so-called 640-acre homestead bill. Under that legislation approximately 60,000 applications have been made to enter the public lands of the United States. The bill carries a provision that none of these entries can be allowed until they are examined—which is a very proper provision—to determine that they are nonmineral, nontimber, and nonirrigable, and so forth, or grazing-land propositions. These 60,000 applications are hung up in midair, awaiting an examination by the Geological Survey, so that they can be allowed or disallowed, as the case may be. The sundry civil appropriation bill carries an appropriation of $150,000 to carry on this examination. That is a little more than $2 a claim for examining the claims, which amount, of course, as is apparent to the House, is wholly inadequate, and means that another year will elapse with these 60,000 applications hung up, neither allowed nor disallowed, which leaves a state of chaos in the West. The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] has placed some amendments on the pending food bill providing for a summary allowance of these entries, without any examination at all, which would subject mineral lands, timberlands, irrigable lands, and all sorts of lands to a legislative classification. It is not necessary to tell the House that such a classification is unwise and improper, and should not be agreed to on this bill, but it is also necessary to let the House understand that something ought to be done toward the solution of that problem. The House Public Lands Committee met, with a view to try to solve this problem in some way or, rather, we met to aid the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] to solve it, and after a conference with the Interior Department, and with the Geological Survey, and with the Commissioner of the General Land Office, they tell us that if we will give them a little more money to carry on this examination they can examine these claims by the aid of the three field forces they have, in something like six months or a year. We have prepared and our committee have agreed to an amendment that provides an additional $100,000, which added to the $150,000 given by the sundry civil bill makes $250,000 for the examination of 60,000 claims. That makes between $4 and $5 a claim. That probably is not enough, although the Interior Department thinks it will do.

Mr. LEVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. LEVER. Was that agreement of your committee a unanimous agreement?

Mr. FERRIS. It was; but I will state to the gentleman——

Mr. LENROOT. It was not.

Mr. FERRIS. I was going to state that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] was not present, and I was going to state that I understand the attitude of Mr. LENROOT to be otherwise, although I had not talked to him on this proposal.

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman from Oklahoma well knew the position of the gentleman from Wisconsin upon it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. FERRIS. I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GILLETT. Reserving the right to object, what has this got to do with the matter now before the House?

Mr. FERRIS. There is no more important proposition in this bill than this matter, which reaches 60,000 homesteaders. We are appropriating hundreds of millions of dollars——

Mr. GILLETT. But the House can not act on this matter now. The conferees have control of it.

Mr. FERRIS. I only want a minute more to bring it to the attention of every Member of the House——

Mr. AUSTIN. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Oklahoma be allowed to proceed for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Oklahoma be allowed to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. DOWELL. I object.

Mr. LEVER. Let me say to the gentleman from Oklahoma that the conferees who represent the House will be glad to hear from him as well as the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], and to listen to any suggestions they may have to make. It is unfortunate, however, that such an amendment should be put on a bill of this character. The members of the House Committee on Agriculture know nothing—at least the chairman of that committee knows nothing—of the public-land laws of this country, and we must get our views from those gentlemen who are well acquainted with these laws. I can say to the gentleman from Oklahoma that both sides of this question shall be heard by the conferees.

Mr. FERRIS. I am perfectly sure of that, and I only wanted to make plain to the House the importance of action upon this matter.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman may be interested in knowing that many Members from the public-land States were consulted in connection with this matter, and they agreed to the amendment suggested by the Public Lands Committee which has been reported.

Mr. LEVER. I assure the gentleman——

Mr. DOWELL. Regular order! This is a matter for the conference committee.

The SPEAKER. It is not debatable. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to take this bill from the Speaker's table, disagree to the Senate amendment, and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate. Is there objection?

Mr. BATHRICK. Reserving the right to object——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL] has demanded the regular order.

Mr. BATHRICK. The regular order is, Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] for an extension of time?

The SPEAKER. No; that was objected to. The regular order is, Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER]?

There was no objection; and the Speaker appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. LEVER, Mr. LEE of Georgia, Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi, Mr. HAUGEN, and Mr. MCLAUGHLIN of Michigan.

TRADING-WITH-THE-ENEMY BILL.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I renew my request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that on July 9, after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of business on the Speaker's table, the enemy trading bill shall be made the special order, and continue to be the special order until it is completed, barring conference reports, appropriation bills, and revenue measures. Is there objection to that?

Mr. LEVER. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. KITCHIN. I ask the gentleman not to do that. It will open up the whole debate again.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. SLAYDEN, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. ASHBROOK, for two weeks, on account of important business.

ACCEPTANCE OF DECORATION FOR AMBASSADOR WHITLOCK (H. DOC. NO. 223).

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit a report by the Secretary of State, accompanied by a copy of a note from the minister of Belgium at Washington expressing the wish of his Government that Mr. Brand Whitlock, the American minister to Belgium, may be permitted to accept a decoration of the Grand Cordon of the Order of Leopold, which the King of the Belgians desires to confer as a recognition of the exceptional circumstances under which Mr. Whitlock discharged his official duties in occupied Belgium and as a testimonial of the King's gratitude to the whole American Nation.

I ask the Congress to consider whether its permission should not be granted for the acceptance of the decoration by Mr. Whitlock, as conferred for "an exceptional, extraordinary, and meritorious act," as set out by the Secretary of State.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, June 29, 1917.

DESERT-LAND ENTRANTS IN MILITARY OR NAVAL SERVICE.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 3331. We have agreed to an amendment, and I do not think there will be any objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask to address the House for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks to proceed for one minute.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3331) for the protection of the owners of mining claims and of desert-land entrymen who enter the military or naval service of the United States in time of war.

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of section 2324 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which require that on each mining claim located after the 10th day of May, 1872, and until patent has been issued therefor, not less than $100 worth of labor shall be performed or improvements made during each year, shall not apply to claims or parts of claims owned or held by officers or enlisted men of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, or Organized Militia of the United States from April 1, 1917, to and including the termination of the existing war, or until six months after such owner or claimant is mustered out of service, or until six months after his death in the service: Provided, That the claimant of any such mining location, in order to obtain the benefits of this act, shall file or cause to be filed in the office where the location notice or certificate is recorded within six months from and after the date of this act, or within six months after he is mustered into the service, a notice of his muster into the service of the United States and of his desire to hold said mining claim under this act.

SEC. 2. That no desert-land entry made or held under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1877, as amended by the act of March 3, 1891, by an officer or enlisted man in the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, or Organized Militia of the United States shall, after April 1, 1917, be subject to contest or cancellation for failure to make or expend the sum of $1 per acre per year in improvements upon such claim, or to effect the reclamation thereof, so long as said entryman or his successor in interest is engaged in the military service of the United States, and the time within which such entryman or claimant is required to make such expenditures and effect reclamation of the land shall include four years, exclusive of the time of his actual service in the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, or Organized Militia of the United States: Provided, That each such entryman or claimant shall, within six months after the passage of this act, or within six months after he is mustered into the service, file in the local land office of the district wherein his claim is situate a notice of his muster into the service of the United States and of his desire to hold said desert claim under this act.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman does this permit a desert-land entry or a mineral entry by a soldier already in the service?

Mr. RAKER. The first section of the bill has been stricken out because the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] had a bill providing for mineral entries. This does for the desert-land entrants just what we did for the homesteader and the mineral claimants yesterday.

Mr. NORTON. But the gentleman has not answered my question. Does not this act in its present form permit a soldier who is now serving in the Army to make an entry and then to receive the benefits or exemptions of the provisions of this bill?

Mr. RAKER. There are no benefits to be received; the only thing is that while in the service he does not have to perform the dollar-an-acre labor.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman permit me to answer the gentleman from North Dakota? It is true, under the bill as it stands, a desert entry could be made by a man in the service on leave, but it strikes me there is no objection to that, because all that this law does is to waive the performance of the labor of a dollar an acre during the period of the service. It does not grant any other right or privilege.

Mr. NORTON. Let me ask the gentleman if the law was passed in the present form, could not I go out to any Army post and secure the application of 500 soldiers to file upon desert-land entries? Their entries would be made upon the land, and then for a period of four years the land could be held free from any other appropriation, without any improvement whatever, and could be used for grazing or for whatever other purpose it might be useful.

Mr. RAKER. No; because the bill expressly says "no desert-land entry." This does not say application. You have got to go to the land, you have got to go and see it, and you have got to have your witnesses, and you could not leave the Army for that purpose. The bill does not apply to that. It applies to those who have desert-land filings or entries, and nothing else.

Mr. NORTON. Well, that is the gentleman's statement.

Mr. RAKER. That is what the department says. The Secretary of the Interior is in favor of it, the Secretary of Agriculture is favorable to it, and the Secretary of War favors it because it protects the men in the service of the United States.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. NORTON. Unless the gentleman can read something to me from the bill stating that the soldier who is now enlisted does not under the provision of this law as it exists have the right to make an entry, I shall object. I do not care anything about the gentleman's oratory or about the approval of the heads of the departments.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman does not know what is in this bill.

Mr. NORTON. I object.

Mr. RAKER. We have passed the objection period.

The SPEAKER. No; the gentleman from California asked that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, and the gentleman from North Dakota objects.

Mr. RAKER. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill (H. R. 3331) for the protection of the owners of mining claims and of desert-land entrymen who enter the military or naval service of the United States in time of war.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. SLAYDEN in the chair.

Mr. RAKER. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think the bill ought to be read.

The Clerk again read the bill, with the following committee amendments:

Strike out all of section 1 of the bill, which includes lines 3 to 10, both inclusive, page 1, and lines 1 to 13, both inclusive, page 2.

Strike out in line 14, page 2, the following: "SEC. 2."

Amend the title by striking out the following words, viz, "of mining claim and,' so that as amended it will read as follows: "For the protection of the owners of desert-land entrymen who enter the military or naval service of the United States in time of war."

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, we are entitled to general debate on the bill. I do not wish to take up the time of the House, but one gentleman here desires to speak upon a subject other than the bill.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman from California appealed to us that he had a bill that would only take a few minutes. Our bill is the regular order, and we gave way under the assurance that his bill would take but a short time. Now, if there is to be general debate on this bill, I think the gentleman from California ought to ask to withdraw the bill.

Mr. FERRIS. Let me appeal to the gentleman from Massachusetts. Yesterday we agreed to a similar bill——

Mr. GILLETT. Oh, I think this bill ought to go through.

Mr. FERRIS. We agreed to a similar bill in regard to homesteaders and in regard to mineral entries. The gentleman from California has this bill for the same purpose as to desert-land entries.

Mr. GILLETT. I understand that. I do not wish to obstruct the passage of this bill.

Mr. FERRIS. Objection was made, and the gentleman from California acceded to the objections that came yesterday and is to offer amendments to satisfy them. The gentleman then gave assurance to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce that this bill would take but a few moments, in which I think he was warranted, but objections sprang up from another source, as the gentleman knows, and I really hope that we can keep out all general debate on both sides.

Mr. GILLETT. Perhaps the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] would allow 30 minutes to this side on his bill.

Mr. SIMS. Let me say to the gentleman that there is another bill coming up, the Niagara bill.

Mr. GILLETT. Is that on the Union Calendar?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT. Then I shall wait until that bill is under consideration.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote on the committee amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Lines 19 and 20, page 2, strike out the language "after April 1, 1917."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 23, page 2, strike out the words "so long as" and insert "during the period."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 2, page 3, strike out the words "include four years" and insert the word "be."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on that amendment.

I want to say with regard to the amendment that the committee just adopted, on line 23, page 2, that that is simply for the purpose of making the language clear. The language was "so long as" and the words inserted were "during the period," in order to make it clear that the time within which the entryman is exempted is during the period of his service. It also makes it clear that a man can not be contested after he leaves the service for failure to perform the work or make the expenditures during his service. The amendment now before us, to strike out, on page 3, the words "include four years" and to insert in lieu thereof the word "be," is for this purpose: The original desert-land law gives the entryman four years within which to make final proof on his entry, but there are a number of laws under which, under certain conditions, there may be an extension of time, and therefore we should make no reference to the period within which he must make proof, but simply provide that, whatever the period be under the law, it shall be exclusive of this service. There is no intention of depriving these men of any extension of time within which to make final proof which the law now allows. The object is to also relieve them of the necessity of expenditures for reclamation during the period of their service. This amendment makes that clear.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 24, page 2, after the words "United States," add the words "during the present war with Germany and until six months thereafter."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the section, in line 10, page 3, change the period to a colon and insert the following:

"Provided further, That the term 'enlisted man' as used in this section shall include any person selected to serve in the military forces of the United States as provided by the act entitled 'An act authorizing the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States,' approved May 18, 1917."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that at the end of that amendment the word "officer" be added; otherwise the amendment would seek to interpret the words "enlisted man" as including all classes, officers and privates as well. That was not the intent of the gentleman in offering his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman offer an amendment to the amendment?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, this is for drafted men. We do not draft officers.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the bill provides for officers and enlisted men. My opinion is that that language as it is in the bill is proper and sufficient, but some of the gentlemen have thought that there might be an interpretation of the term "enlisted man" so as not to include the men who were drafted; hence this legislative interpretation to the effect that "enlisted man" includes everyone called to the service. The bill already provides for officers, and the interpretation was not intended, I am sure, to be all-embracing of officers and enlisted men as well. I assume, however, that the department may so interpret it, and I shall not insist upon my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 3, after the word "Navy," insert the word "or," and, in the same line, strike out the words "or Organized Militia."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on this amendment. I do not believe the words "or Organized Militia" should be stricken out, for the reason there are now in Federal service from the States of Texas, Arizona, and New Mexico Organized Militia called into the service of the United States over a year ago to resist invasion from Mexico. All the other National Guard regiments from the other States were called into Federal service for border-patrol duty after the passage of the Army reorganization act, which became a law in June, 1916, whereas the National Guard of Texas, Arizona, and New Mexico were called forth in May of last year as Organized Militia and are still known as such, although they will be drafted into Federal service under the selective-draft act on the 5th of next August.

Mr. LENROOT. Let me ask the gentleman, after these National Guards are all drafted each State will continue to have a National Guard or an Organized Militia for their home defense, would they not?

Mr. HAYDEN. There are two kinds of National Guard at the present time——

Mr. LENROOT. And therefore you should strike out "Organized Militia."

Mr. HAYDEN. If this amendment prevails, the Organized Militia in the service of the United States can not get the benefit of this act.

Mr. LENROOT. They will anyway.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. They become enlisted men of the Army and Navy.

Mr. HAYDEN. Why not leave specific mention of the Organized Militia in the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Because it will extend to the militia who will not be in the service of the United States. Certainly the gentleman does not intend to extend this exemption to those who are not called into the service of the United States?

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I want to be heard in opposition to this amendment. I am not entirely sure I am right about it, but I think I am. I think to strike out these words "or Organized Militia" and allow men who are being held in the camps and in training camps to be excluded from the opportunity that an ordinary citizen has to file a homestead on public land in the West is a mistake. I know the gentleman from Wisconsin is moving with caution in order to draft better legislation, but I think he is going to strike a blow at the young men of this country who are trying to prepare themselves for the service, going to the training camps. One branch of the Army is the militia. We have created a Militia Bureau, the head of which is Gen. Mann, of the War Department. We have created cantonments all over the United States for military training of the boys from the country in the service, and I do not think the Organized Militia ought to be stricken out.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. I assume the gentleman does not wish to extend this privilege to those in the National Guard who are not called into the service of the United States?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes, I do. They are entitled to it. Of course I am not the last word on military matters and I may be in error about this. But I can see no good reason for this.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman will remember when we had under consideration the Army reorganization bill it recognized two classes, the National Guard per se and the militia, and the National Guard when taken into the fold of the United States became part and parcel of the Army of the United States. Now, this is to extend the privilege——

Mr. FERRIS. The trouble is that the gentleman's suppositions are right and his facts are wrong. Now, men are to be taken into the service in three forms: First, the Regulars; second, the National Guard or the militia; and, third, the conscripted army, known as the National Army. They are carried in three divisions, and cantonments are being established for the purpose of training them in separate units of the Army. The gentleman from Texas who sits in the chair knows he has one cantonment at Fort Sam Houston to train the conscripted army. He knows there are three more in Texas to train the militia or the National Guard. These men may be held in camps for weeks or months, and perhaps years, in training in preparation for going into the National Guard Army or into the Regular Army, and because they are subject to be drafted into the militia army or the Regular Army they should not be excluded from this legislation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Would the gentleman have any objection to the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] to strike out "Army, Navy, Marine Corps, or Organized Militia" and insert "military or naval service of the United States"?

Mr. HAYDEN. I think that would be all right.

Mr. FERRIS. I really have objection to the whole amendment. The real truth is, this committee comes in here with some legislation trying to aid our boys, trying to keep claim jumpers from taking land away from our boys who are serving the Republic, in these three little bills which have been brought up here, and yesterday we were badgered and hounded as though the bills were of no importance.

To-day we are hounded and besieged on every side because we are trying to do a little more for these boys, not carrying one cent of appropriation against the Federal Treasury. It would seem, Mr. Chairman, in this Congress, that in order to popularize a bill we must have it carry a $100,000,000 appropriation. I tell you, Mr. Chairman, there are going to be some new voices heard in this House unless this committee is treated with a little more respect and unless the bills which they are trying to pass for the benefit of the boys who are fighting for us are treated with a little more respect. Appropriations go through here by unanimous consent. Anyone who dares to question them is castigated, but when it comes to some real relief for some real fellows who are first willing to try to develop the West and, second, willing to fight for and defend their country everyone assails them.

Here is an amendment—a great, long amendment—that has never been submitted to the committee at all. It was agreed by Mr. RAKER he would accept it to get consent here so that we can get consideration of this bill. The gentleman in charge of the bill, anxious to render service to these boys, has agreed to an amendment here that ought not to be adopted. It is not necessary to adopt it.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] may have been technically correct originally, but a man is an enlisted man once he is enrolled and sworn in, whether he volunteers or is conscripted. I think there is equal argument that could be made against this other amendment that was brought in here. I think there is absolutely no necessity for this one. I think it encumbers the bill. I think it is purely technical, and the whole amendment ought to be disagreed to, so that every enlisted man, whether he be a National Guardsman or a Regular or whether he be a conscripted man, ought to have the same relief. And I am not willing any longer to sit here, without protest at least, as chairman of the committee, and allow great, long amendments to be put in this bill when the authors themselves, although well meaning, do not know what they are about. [Applause.]

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, the distinguished chairman of the committee has criticized the House for its action upon a certain bill yesterday. I wonder if the gentleman realizes if it had not been for the amendment put into that bill by the House yesterday every man serving in the United States during this war——

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield? To which I make a positive denial, both in truth and in fact. The facts are not to that effect at all, and the Interior Department is not in agreement with the gentleman, and no member of the committee is in agreement with the gentleman. The gentleman is a member of the committee and saw the light first yesterday as to that.

Mr. LENROOT As to that, perhaps the gentleman can make a bald statement of that kind, but I should be willing to submit that matter to Mr. Finney, of the Land Department, whom the gentleman and I know very well, and for whose opinion I have great regard, as to whether or not entries could not have been made after enlistment, just as the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE] contended they ought to be made, if it had not been for the amendment adopted by the House.

Mr. FERRIS. The report of the department does not agree with the gentleman.

Mr. LENROOT. They did not report on that proposition. The department, as the gentleman knows quite as well as I do, is not infallible and is quite as subject to making mistakes as the committee itself is, and I am quite frank to say that we are not infallible. The gentleman evidently thinks the Committee on the Public Lands—and I am proud to be a member of it—is infallible and can not make a mistake. The committee can make mistakes just as other committees do make mistakes, and it is no reflection upon our committee if an amendment offered to a bill that comes from that committee is agreed to in the House. And upon this bill I want to call the attention to what the bill will do if it is not amended.

The first part of the bill, relating to Organized Militia, I have no objection to, because that limits it to the Organized Militia that is in the actual service of the United States. But when you come to the second use of the term "Organized Militia," what does it do? It says:

> And the time within which such entryman or claimant is required to make such expenditures and effect reclamation of the land shall include four years—

That has now been amended—> exclusive of the time of his actual service in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps, or Organized Militia of the United States.

That is not confined to the service of the United States. That is not confined to the period of the war. As long as he remains a member of the National Guard of any State, he never will be required to make final proof under the bill as it now stands.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, there is no gentleman in the House for whom I have a higher regard than the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands, but I think that all of us sometimes get a little impatient with regard to our legislation, and I am afraid the gentleman has grown a little impatient.

Under the laws a soldier in the service of the United States can make an application under the new 640-acre homestead law the same as anybody else, without going near the land, and that if we had not amended the bill yesterday it would have been possible for men in every camp in the United States who were qualified homestead entrymen to make such an application, and if the land was held subject to entry to enter and hold it without improvement or residence during the entire period of his service. The folks on the public land have not asked for that. The amendment does not prevent a man while in the service from making the application or entry. It simply does not include such entry, made after the service began and not based on an application or settlement initiated before the beginning of service from having the benefits of that particular bill.

Some gentlemen have seen fit to criticize what was done and to pose as the particular friend and patron of the soldier. These gentlemen are not the only friends the soldiers have, fortunately for the soldiers.

The purpose of the bill before us was to care for the interests of men who had taken any steps toward securing a homestead by making settlement, application, or entry, so that their rights would be secure and their required time of residence run while in the service as though they were on the land. It was not intended that the fact of enlistment should be used after enlistment as a means of taking up land and securing title without residence or cultivation. I do not know of any western soldier, or soldier anywhere for that matter, who is asking for any such privilege.

If gentlemen want to urge a land-bounty law, that is another thing. It had no place on that particular bill. I feel quite confident that gentlemen, after they think about it, will not want to give men in eastern military camps, or even in Europe, the right to make applications and entries covering in the aggregate thousands—it might be millions—of acres of lands in the West, and to hold them indefinitely as an added emolument of military service. If they do, the people who live where these lands are do not want that to occur. We want to and we will fully protect every honest settler, applicant, or entryman who enters into the service of his country, but we do not want the boys in eastern camps tempted to make speculative entries. They are not asking us to do so. We never have done so in our past wars.

So much for that. This particular controversy grows out of an unfortunate use of language. Legislation of this sort, instead of designating all the various branches of the service, should use the language "military or naval service of the United States"—that is all embracing.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. MONDELL. Just a moment. I want to make this clear. Now, that embraces every man in the service. The men who are asking for this relief, and to whom the relief should be granted, and to whom the relief has been granted in the past, are men in the service of the United States, and by striking out all of these words intended to be descriptive of the very branch of the service and saying "men in the military and naval service of the United States," we shall in this bill do what we have done before and what is asked.

I do not think the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin should be adopted, and if it is not I am content to leave the language as written in the bill, but if there is to be a change, we should adopt terms that are general and embrace all branches of the service.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I want to see if we can not agree to accept the suggestion made by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL]. He is thoroughly informed on public-land law. We should make it, as he suggests, apply to all the Army and Naval forces. Then we shall not run the risk, by making specific mention, of excluding some one whom we do not want to exclude.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I have a high regard for the gentleman from Wyoming, and have listened attentively to his statement, but in this I think he is wrong. This is the language that has heretofore been used in the law. It was copied from it.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, have I the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me a minute?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. If it does not come out of my time, I will.

Mr. ADAMSON. I am not trying to interfere with the business before the House, but the gentleman from California secured recognition on the assurance to the House that this would take only a few minutes, displacing a matter that was almost finished, a matter that was the regular order of the House. I will ask him candidly, if he thinks this debate is to continue longer, whether the gentleman would move to rise and proceed with the regular order?

Mr. RAKER. I will say to the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce that I am satisfied that four or five minutes only will be required to finish this.

Mr. SIMS. I would like the gentleman from Oklahoma to make this agreement, that if he does not finish the disposal of this bill within four or five minutes he will move that the committee rise.

Mr. FERRIS. We are hastening this as fast as we can, but I will remind the gentleman that yesterday was the first time that a committee dealing with 700,000,000 acres of public land and 160,000,000 acres of forest reserve, and 60,000,000 acres containing coal and water power has asked for a vote, and ask whether there has been a day when the genial gentleman from Georgia has not been strenuously endeavoring to get bills through? I do not know of any such. The gentleman ought to be a little patient with us.

A MEMBER. Regular order!

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, it seems that no two single authorities on the Committee on Public Lands can agree for two consecutive minutes on the meaning of this language. As a layman on public lands, but as one who has public lands in his district and is therefore interested in the subject, I want to freely express my opinion. My opinion is not based necessarily on any expert knowledge of public lands, but it is based on some knowledge and some appreciation of existing conditions at the present time, and I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

I want to see this language stand as it is drawn. If I were to draw it myself, I would draw it and shape it and frame it a little bit differently, but this will do the business. I take issue with the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] and with the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], and I take it short and sharp. We are calling, in these days of the war, on the manhood of the Nation for what purpose? For the defense of the land and to fight our battles abroad. It is military service whether it is performed by the Navy, by the Regular Army, by the National Guard, by the home guard, or by the Organized Militia. It is military service, and I do not care in which form they serve. I do not care whether a man is upon the Atlantic in the submarine zone; I do not care whether he is in the Regular Army with the gallant Pershing in France; I do not care whether he is in the National Guard on the plains of Texas, sworn into the service of the United States; I do not care whether he is a man just recruited in the Organized Militia of California, of Arizona, of Minnesota, or any other State, not yet taken into the service of the United States. He is among the military forces, engaged in this one great work, and he ought to have the protection that this bill gives. [Applause.]

Let us give it to him ungrudgingly. Mark you! You ask these men to go from their homesteads in the forests or on the prairies, 10 or 20 or 30 or 40 miles, leaving their wives and children exposed to privation and the elements, to join the National Guard or the militia or the home guard to defend the vital places in our country, perhaps to defend railroads, docks, elevators, steamboat lines, or bridges. They are organized militia. Perhaps they may be called home guards. They are not yet sworn into the service of the United States, but if we have any sense of propriety at all, if we wish to reward merit in any form, let us take care of these boys who are thus serving the public welfare in a protecting sense just the same as those who are in the Regular Establishment. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, the danger of hastily amending carefully prepared bills was directed to our attention forcibly yesterday and to-day. Men bob up here to make amendments to bills that they have not studied, and we do not know where we are getting.

The most unfortunate amendment recently offered in this House was one made yesterday. This morning it developed that the gentlemen who advocated it yesterday did so under a misapprehension of the existing law and had no comprehension whatever of what they were undertaking to do.

A soldier who goes into the Army retains his right to make a homestead entry, but it is of no use to him when he can not go out and settle the land and retain it. This land will all be taken sometime. Who has a better right to it than the man you conscript? So this bill was drawn that a man who went into the Army to risk his life should not forfeit any of his civil rights. It was proposed that a man who had begun a homestead entry should receive credit on that homestead for the time he was in the Army and should forfeit no rights by absence. Up rose a gentleman who said the arid country will be lost to civilization during this war, because land sharks will go around and persuade the soldiers to take these claims by proxy and hold them out from development. There is not going to be any public-land development during this great war. This land will not be wasted while 5,000,000 men are fighting in Europe. There will not be any claims taken up out West. Forget it! You will lose nothing if soldiers take them all up. [Laughter.]

You say agents will come and those fighting in Europe will give them power of attorney to go out and enter these lands and then buy them for a song and prevent actual development. There is a statute which gives to honorably discharged soldiers the right to enter public land in that way, and it has no more application to the soldier in Europe, the men under this bill whom they were trying to rescue from that alleged menace, than a milk statute would have.

The gentlemen had no serious conception of the situation they so cheerfully invaded yesterday, as was conclusively shown here by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN], who probably has had more experience in land-claim law than any other man in this House. Our overflow went down into his country. I overflowed down there myself a little at one time, and I am familiar with the gentleman's practice. He is entirely correct in his suggestion. I concur without fear of contradiction in his statement that one of these soldiers could not issue such a power of attorney. Nothing of that kind could be done. When they come home the present law will be amended to include them. These men here yesterday were fighting a straw man when they persuaded you to take away from the soldier in Europe a right to make an entry while at war and credit his land with the time he was in the war; and in doing this they drew a class distinction and branded the soldier and punished him for going to Europe, and they did it because they supposed our boys somewhere in France could delegate their right to make an entry, as can a Cuban or Philippine veteran in Wisconsin or Wyoming, as the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] explained this morning.

Now, gentlemen, this is a war session. This is not a session to develop the lands of the West. It is a session when we ought to pass legislation to help the Army and further the interests of the soldiers who are going across the water to fight our battles. For that purpose this bill was introduced, which you crippled yesterday, on a fallacious legal theory. We are here to help our armies win a victory, and we had better get down to business and quit floundering around here and talking about western lands. You can not revamp the political debates of five years ago and apply them now. You did a great wrong to the soldier yesterday, those of you who voted to deprive him of the right to have credit on his land entry for the time of his service in Europe, whenever he should make an entry while in the Army. You did it on account of somebody's pipe dream that he could issue a power of attorney, as is provided for discharged soldiers. You put a brand upon him. You removed him into a class by himself. You said to him, "You have not got sense enough to take one of these land warrants and use it. Your comrades who made entries before enlisting were bright and can be trusted and credited on their entries with their Army records, but not you." These gentlemen were guarding against a purely imaginary danger. The soldier could not do anything of the kind that has been suggested here. As the chairman of the committee [Mr. FERRIS] suggested, this legislation yesterday was carefully prepared in the form in which the bill was presented, and gentlemen who wish to amend it should give the subject careful consideration before urging changes that might, and yesterday did, do fatal injury to the bill.

Mr. RAKER. I offered this amendment, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. LITTLE. I was not discussing this amendment. I was talking about what was done yesterday, as were the gentlemen whose argument I am discussing——

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman objected to the amendment, and I wanted to bring it before the House, to let the House understand what it is about. I have offered the amendment. The House may pass upon it. This bill was thoroughly gone into by the Land Department in the form in which it is presented, and I believe it is a good bill. I think my amendment would improve it, but it is before the House for its action.

Mr. LITTLE. I have served on the Irrigation Committee with the gentleman who has just spoken [Mr. RAKER], and I have found that he is familiar with these land laws, and I have confidence in his judgment. I was not seeking to oppose his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. LITTLE. I ask for one minute more to answer the gentleman's query.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute. Is there objection?

Mr. FERRIS. I will ask that at the conclusion of that one minute debate be closed.

Mr. STAFFORD. I should like to have five minutes. This is a very important amendment.

Mr. FERRIS. Then I ask unanimous consent that debate close at the end of six minutes, one minute to go to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE] and five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that at the end of six minutes, one minute to go to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE] and five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], the debate be closed. Is there objection.

There was no objection.

Mr. LITTLE. I will say to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] I came in during this discussion, and I did not know any more about his pending amendment than the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] knew about the amendment they put through yesterday. I was not speaking against the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER], but these other gentleman brought my name into the discussion. They did not discuss the amendment of the gentleman from California, but they discussed their action of yesterday, endeavoring to justify it, referring to my humble effort to secure for soldiers in foreign lands the right to secure a claim on any public lands opened during their absence abroad. I do not want to say anything against the gentleman's amendment. It may be a good one, but as a general proposition we ought to be very careful, as the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] has suggested, about offering any loosely drawn amendments. Before this war closes all our public lands may be opened to settlement and taken up by those at home, without giving the conscript on the Rhine a chance to save a farm. That is what comes of an ill-advised amendment yesterday. I want to say to you gentlemen that this is a war session, and you had better get busy and pass legislation with that fact in view for the benefit of the Army and the soldiers. Yesterday's bill was drawn to preserve and increase the conscript's rights, not nullify them. This country has assumed a task that will occupy all its attention for some time to come. You can not develop the great West while this war is going on. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. For the purpose of making this bill of some real value, I rise to call the attention of the distinguished chairman of the committee [Mr. FERRIS] and of that new Member from the arid plains of Kansas [Mr. LITTLE], more new than any other new Member here——

Mr. LITTLE. More arid. [Laughter.]

Mr. STAFFORD. To the fact that if this bill should be passed in its present form it would not amount to as much as a snowball in the lower regions, for the reason that, as has been called to my attention by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS], there is no act of March 3, 1892, which this bill seeks to amend. I have examined the statutes and have found no act whatsoever of that date. Of course, after the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE] has been here a little longer, perhaps he will see that it is of some value for Members to scrutinize bills reported from committees of exceeding excellence, even when comprised of such worthies as the gentleman from Oklahoma and the gentleman from California.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. Possibly the gentleman who gave the information to the effect that there was no such act as the one mentioned was not aware of the fact that that provision was a part of a sundry civil bill. I will not be absolutely certain, but my recollection is that it is a part of a sundry civil bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am not going to allow the gentleman to throw any slurs or insinuations upon the assiduity and carefulness of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS], because I confirm the fact that instead of being the act of March 3, 1892, it was the act of March 3, 1891.

Mr. MONDELL. I think the gentleman is right about that.

Mr. STAFFORD. I knew the gentleman would agree with me as soon as I called his attention to the fact, and this will show to the gentleman from Kansas that there is some value in our scrutinizing these bills. At the proper time I will ask the chairman of the committee to move, or will move myself, to strike out "ninety-two," in line 17, and insert "ninety-one."

Mr. RAKER. I agree with the gentleman. He is correct about that.

Mr. STAFFORD. So that it is a good thing to scrutinize even a good bill. That is all I care to say.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

Mr. LITTLE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LITTLE. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], who is so familiar with parliamentary law and usage here, has startled me a little by his suggestion as to the rights of a new Member. Do I understand that a new Member is not allowed to discuss bills under consideration just as other Members?

The CHAIRMAN. That is hardly a parliamentary inquiry. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, on page 2, line 17, the word "ninety-two" and insert the word "ninety-one."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 4, after the word "Provided," insert "That said desert-land entry shall have been made by said officer or enlisted man prior to his enlistment: Provided further."

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, the amendment I offer is to make certain that the provisions and exemptions of this act shall be applicable only where the entry has been made prior to the time the entryman enlisted in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States. I believe that is what the House desires in this legislation, the same as in the legislation that was passed yesterday in reference to homestead entries.

I want to further call attention of the House to this fact, that the legislation we have before us is general legislation. The legislation yesterday was confined to a period during the war with Germany, or any other war in which the country might be involved.

Mr. FERRIS. That has been amended.

Mr. NORTON. The gentleman from Oklahoma calls my attention to the fact that an amendment has been made, restricting the terms of this act to the period of the present war. If that is so, it escaped my notice.

Mr. FERRIS. There was an amendment adopted in line 23 making it during the war.

Mr. NORTON. That amendment was very much needed for the reason that if the amendment had not been adopted the provisions of this bill would apply to the Organized Militia of the United States in the several States after the war. Any man who belonged to the militia of any State could be exempted from complying with the provisions of the desert-land laws as to improvements and cultivation. I do not believe that men generally who have any acquaintance with the unappropriated public desert lands of the country would desire any legislation of that kind.

Gentlemen have in attempted flights of oratory seen fit to criticize members of this committee for offering amendments to this bill when at the same time they arise in their seats and admit that amendments have been offered and adopted which improve the proposed legislation. I have no objection to gentlemen making orations for home consumption and voicing their self-asserted patriotism, as the gentleman from Zenith City by the unsalted sea has done, as it is evident here in the House that other gentlemen who are modest and reticent in asserting their patriotism are not, as a matter of fact, less patriotic in any manner than the gentlemen who are so fond of announcing their patriotism in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, but I do think it might be well for gentlemen to give some careful study and consideration to some of the legislation that is presented to the House and to try to understand the wording and the full meaning of some of the poorly considered and poorly prepared bills, like this one, which are often thrust upon the House.

Mr. MORGAN rose.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment close in five minutes.

Mr. MORGAN. All right, if I can have the five minutes. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAKER. Four for the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] and one for me.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment close in five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I think the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Dakota should prevail. As we amended the bills yesterday, the benefit is confined to entries made prior to the time the soldier enters the Army. Now, we do not give the homestead entrymen who are soldiers the benefit of the law unless the entry is made before they enter into the service.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. While we do not believe it is necessary, yet at the same time we have no objections to the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. I am very glad that the gentleman has consented to the amendment. Now, I want one minute more. I did not say quite all I wished to when the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] was talking. I understood him to claim that one could make a homestead entry through an agent, and that had always been the law. I am certain the gentleman is mistaken. Under the homestead law no one has ever been allowed to make a homestead entry through an agent except an honorably discharged soldier. The soldier, during the time of his service, could not make entry through an agent. He is required to wait until he is discharged. That has always been the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Dakota.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with amendments to the House.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I demand a division.

Mr. NORTON. I demand a division.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say that there was no question about the preponderance of the noes over the ayes in the vive voce vote, but the Chair will indulge the gentleman's request for a division.

The committee divided; and there were 33 ayes and 1 no.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SLAYDEN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 3331) for the protection of the owners of mining claims and of desert-land entrymen who enter the military or naval service of the United States in time of war, and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

There was no demand for a separate vote.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. RAKER, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

AMENDING THE ACT TO REGULATE COMMERCE.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (S. 2356) to amend the act to regulate commerce as amended, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. CRISP in the chair.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment on page 6, to go in at the end of line 14.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, line 14, after the word "commerce," insert the following: "Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to repeal, modify, or affect either section 6 or section 20 of an act entitled 'An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints or monopolies, and for other purposes,' approved October 15, 1914."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, to avoid taking up the time of the committee I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks upon this amendment and on the bill by printing a letter and a portion of the address of the President of the United States and House joint resolution No. 111 and a letter from the president of the Commercial Club of Nashville, Tenn., and other matters.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, in support of the amendment that I have just offered on the part of the committee I beg to read from the address of the President of the United States delivered on the 4th day of July, 1916, on the dedication of the American Federation of Labor Office Building in Washington, D. C., what he said as to section 6 of the Clayton Antitrust Act, which is as follows:

Mr. Gompers was referring just now to the sixth section of the Clayton antitrust law, the section in which the obvious is stated, namely, that a man's labor is not a commodity, but a part of his life, and that therefore the courts must not treat it as if it were a commodity but must treat it as if it were a part of his life. I am sorry that there were any judges in the United States who had to be told that. It is so obvious that it seems to me that that section of the Clayton Act were a return to the primer of human liberty; but if the judges have to have the primer opened before them I am willing to open it. If any part of the United States, through habit, through ancient prejudice, through long addiction to technical ideas, insists upon living in an age which everybody else with his eyes open knows has gone by, why, then we have got to sound some great note that will wake them up, but wake them up always to the same thing with which we would thrill as well as others; that it is take as well as give; that the other man has as much right as we have; that we are not to seek for an advantage but for an equality; that though we have been put upon we do not desire to see any other man put upon or any other class, but that we should all have as our highest ideal merely to bask in that only nourishing sun that has ever shone upon the human heart, the sun of justice and of truth and of humanity.

Mr. Chairman, section 6 of the Clayton Act, referred to by the President, reads as follows:

SEC. 6. That the labor of a human being is not a commodity or article of commerce. Nothing contained in the antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid the existence and operation of labor, agricultural, or horticultural organizations instituted for the purposes of mutual help and not having capital stock or conducted for profit or to forbid or restrain individual members of such organizations from lawfully carrying out the legitimate objects thereof; nor shall such organizations or the members thereof be held or construed to be illegal combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade under the antitrust laws.

Section 20 of the Clayton Act, referred to in the amendment I have just offered, reads as follows:

SEC. 20. That no restraining order or injunction shall be granted by any court of the United States, or a judge or the judges thereof, in any case between an employer and employees, or between employers and employees, or between employees, or between persons employed and persons seeking employment, involving, or growing out of, a dispute concerning terms or conditions of employment, unless necessary to prevent irreparable injury to property, or to a property right, of the party making the application, for which injury there is no adequate remedy at law, and such property or property right must be described with particularity in the application, which must be in writing and sworn to by the applicant or by his agent or attorney.

And no such restraining order or injunction shall prohibit any person or persons, whether singly or in concert, from terminating any relation of employment, or from ceasing to perform any work or labor, or from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful means so to do; or from attending at any place where any such person or persons may lawfully be, for the purpose of peacefully obtaining or communicating information, or from peacefully persuading any person to work or to abstain from working; or from ceasing to patronize or to employ any party to such dispute, or from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful and lawful means so to do; or from paying or giving to, or withholding from, any person engaged in such dispute, any strike benefits or other moneys or things of value; or from peaceably assembling in a lawful manner, and for lawful purposes; or from doing any act or thing which might lawfully be done in the absence of such dispute by any party thereto; nor shall any of the acts specified in this paragraph be considered or held to be violations of any law of the United States.

These sections need only to be read and understood in order to command the support of any liberty-loving citizen of our country, and they can not too often be reaffirmed by the Congress of the United States, and I am glad to be able to say that I am offering this amendment with the consent and approval of the committee.

Mr. Chairman, this bill chiefly provides for preferential shipments during the war, and that such powers as are given to the President in this bill are shown to be necessary by a letter which I have just received from the president of the Commercial Club of Nashville, Tenn., which I now read:

COMMERCIAL CLUB OF NASHVILLE,
June 27, 1917.

Hon. THETUS W. SIMS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SIMS: This section of the country is suffering from car shortage, and, while we appreciate that the demand is great and the supply is not sufficient to meet the demand, still we are forced to the conclusion that the railroads serving us are not getting the number of box cars that they are entitled to.

We hold no brief for any railroad company, but we are approaching you and asking your assistance in the interest of the shippers of this section.

We are sure that you are familiar with the agreement entered into by the various railroads, forming a gentleman's agreement in connection with the War Department, in regard to pro rating cars to the different lines.

The shortage that exists here has forced our shippers to demand of the transportation companies the reasons why their wants can not be supplied, and we find upon investigation what appears to us to be rank discrimination by the committee having the matter in charge.

The country, as we understand it, has been divided into five divisions, and a committee of railroad officials has charge and are supposed to give to these five divisions their pro rata of box cars.

The two lines serving Nashville—the Louisville & Nashville and the Nashville, Chattanooga & St. Louis Railroads—are neither one represented on this committee. We find that at least three of the railroads with a representative on the committee have not only in use the cars that they own but have, in addition, cars of other lines amounting from 10 to 50 per cent of the cars owned by them. Conditions as regards the lines serving us are just the reverse. These lines not only have not been able to secure cars owned by them, but at this time are short of their own cars about 33 per cent.

We are advised by the officials of these companies that they have made repeated efforts through the committee to have this matter rectified, but so far without success.

While we appreciate that there is at this time probably no legal way to force the committee to at least give the lines serving us the cars that they own, still we feel that you can exert an influence through the War Department that might at least bring about relief to the situation.

While the War Department may have no legal power to change these conditions, the shippers in this section certainly feel that it should use its good offices to have these discriminations corrected; and we write to ask you to join in with the other members of the Tennessee delegation and make a concerted effort to have the War Department bring its influence to bear to that end.

It was at the instance of the War Department that the railroads pooled their holdings of cars, and it certainly would be right and proper for it to use its influence in correcting these discriminations.

We are writing this letter to each member of the Tennessee delegation, and will appreciate your interest and efforts in our behalf.

The loss we have undergone up to this time will be as nothing to what it will be when the crops begin to move, which will be, as you know, in a very short time.

Awaiting your reply and thanking you in advance for your thoughtful consideration of this matter, we are,

Yours, very truly,

GEO. R. GILLESPIE, President.

Attest:

WILL R. MANIER, Secretary.

Mr. Chairman, while I am supporting this bill and hope it will accomplish what is desired and what is imperatively necessary, I have doubt as to the success of the bill to as full and ample an extent as may be needed. For this reason I have introduced House joint resolution 111, Sixty-fifth Congress, for the purpose of enacting into law the recommendations of the Federal Trade Commission, made in its report of June 19, 1917, on Senate resolution 51, Sixty-fifth Congress, first session, and Senate resolution 217, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session. Said joint resolution is as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 111) to provide further for the national security and defense by regulating the production, sale, distribution, and transportation of coal and coke, and for the coordination of the railroads of the United States for the efficient transportation and distribution thereof.

Whereas the existence of a state of war has caused a national emergency, and it is essential for the national security and defense to assure an adequate supply and equitable distribution of coal and coke at reasonable prices for the Government and the people and the industries of the United States and to protect them against exorbitant prices for such coal and coke; and

Whereas the prices of coal and coke in many parts of the United States have reached an exorbitant level; and

Whereas a large number of consumers, both domestic and industrial, are unable to obtain sufficient supplies of this prime necessity; and

Whereas the failure to procure such prime necessity impairs the health and strength of the people of the United States upon whom the national defense depends, and involves the partial or complete cessation of many industries essential to the supplying of the armed forces with necessary materials and munitions of war; and

Whereas the payment of exorbitantly high prices for coal imposes such an expense on the people of the United States as to materially impair their means of sustenance and their financial ability to assist in providing for the national defense, and so increases the cost of production of many industries essential to properly arming and supplying the military forces of the country that the prices of their products are greatly enhanced to the increased expense of the Government in the purchase of supplies necessary for the prosecution of the war; and

Whereas the coordination of railway and water transportation is a primary factor in the production and distribution of an adequate supply of coal and coke to meet the extraordinary needs of the Government and of the people and industries of the United States; and

Whereas the transportation of coal and coke is so large a factor in the total transportation of commodities in the United States that the control of transportation as to coal and coke makes necessary the control of all transportation: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, etc., That it is necessary, in order to execute the powers of Congress to raise and support armies, provide and maintain a navy, and in order to efficiently and effectively provide for the common defense, that the President of the United States be authorized and empowered, and he is hereby so authorized and empowered, whenever in his judgment it shall be necessary for the efficient prosecution of the war, to direct any or all producers of coal or coke, either in any special area or in any special coal fields, or in the entire United States, to sell their product only to the United States through an agency to be designated by the President, such agency to regulate the resale of such coal and coke and the prices thereof and to fix the compensation to be paid such producers by the United States and to regulate the method of production including compensation of employees of mines, distribution, classification and grading, routes of transportation, apportionment or storage of such coal and coke among merchants, domestic consumers, industrial consumers, common carriers, and others, or of export, and to make payment of the purchase price of such coal or coke to producers thereof or to the person or persons legally entitled to said payment.

That within 15 days after notice from the agency so designated to any coal-mine operator or producer of coke that his output of coal or coke is to be included in any pool or pools formed by purchase by the United States, as hereinbefore described, such coal-mine operator or producer of coke shall cease shipments of coal or coke upon his own account and shall transmit to such agency all orders received and unfilled or partially unfilled, showing the exact extent to which shipments have been made therein, and thereafter all shipments of coal or coke shall be made only on authority of the agency designated by the President, and thereafter no such operator of coal mines or producer of coke shall sell any coal or coke except to the United States through such agency, and the said agency alone is hereby authorized and empowered to purchase the output of coal or coke of such coal-mine operator or producer of coke whose output is included in any such pool or pools during the continuance of the operation of such pool or pools.

That the prices to be paid for such coal or coke so purchased shall be based upon a fair and just profit per ton over and above the cost of production of such coal or coke, including proper maintenance and depletion charges, the reasonableness of such profit and the cost of production to be determined by the said agency, and if the prices fixed by the said agency of any coal or coke purchased by the United States as hereinbefore described be unsatisfactory to the person or persons entitled to the same, such person or persons shall have the right to sue the United States in the manner provided for by section 24, paragraph 20, and section 145 of the Judicial Code, to recover such other sum as added to the amount so fixed will be just compensation.

All coal or coke so sold through any pool or pools established or operated by the said agency shall be sold for cash and at such uniform prices as may be determined by said agency to be just and fair.

The books, correspondence, records, and papers in any way referring to transactions of any kind relating to the mining, production, sale, or distribution of all mine operators or other persons whose coal or coke has, or may, become subject to contribution in such pool or pools, and the books, correspondence, records, and papers of any person applying for the purchase of coal or coke from such pool or pools shall at all times be subject to inspection by the said agency, and such person or persons shall promptly furnish said agency any data or information relating to the business of such person or persons which said agency may call for, and said agency is hereby authorized to procure the information in reference to the business of such coal-mine operators and producers of coke, and customers therefor, in the manner provided for in sections 6 and 9 of the act of Congress approved September 26, 1914, entitled "An act to create a Federal Trade Commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes," and said agency is hereby authorized and empowered to exercise all the powers granted to the Federal Trade Commission by said act for the carrying out of the purposes of this resolution.

That the sum of $10,000,000 for the carrying out of the provisions of this resolution is hereby appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated. That said sum be used only as working capital for the carrying out of the purposes of this resolution.

The President of the United States is hereby authorized and empowered, whenever in his judgment it shall be necessary for the efficient prosecution of the war, to direct any or all railroads, ships, or boats engaged in coastwise or inland lake or river trade, and all other common carriers in the United States to be operated as a unit on Government account under direction and control of the Interstate Commerce Commission under such rules and regulations as the Interstate Commerce Commission shall prescribe, and the owning corporations, person, or persons shall be paid a compensation for such service to be equal to the average annual net amount earned by each such common carrier for the five-year period prior to June 30, 1916. Such direction and control shall continue for the period of the war and not to exceed one year thereafter. All earnings of such carriers, from whatever sources shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States, and all operating expenses and compensation to such carriers shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States from funds not otherwise appropriated, on warrants of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and any surplus remaining out of the earnings after paying operating expenses and compensation as above directed be covered into the general fund of the Treasury of the United States.

That the President of the United States is hereby authorized and empowered to prescribe such rules and regulations as he may deem essential and necessary to the proper enforcement of this resolution.

The word "person" wherever used in this resolution shall include individuals, partnerships, associations, and corporations.

Any person who willfully violates any of the provisions of this resolution, or any regulation made by the President for the proper enforcement of this resolution, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and, on conviction thereof, shall be fined not exceeding $3,000 or be imprisoned for not more than two years, or both, and each act of violation shall constitute a separate offense.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, yesterday afternoon before the House adjourned, at the suggestion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], the chairman of the committee agreed to offer an amendment, at the beginning of line 19, to insert the words "in his judgment."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas offer such an amendment?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. RAYBURN: Page 6, line 19, before the word "may," insert the words "in his judgment."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, strike out all of line 18, down to and including line 25, and on page 6 strike out lines 1 to 14.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I followed the discussion yesterday very closely, and I was unable to obtain from the chairman of the committee or the members of the committee the specific purpose of this paragraph in the bill. It surely can not apply to strikes, because the proviso just inserted by the committee takes care of that. What we are doing is to extend the jurisdiction of the Federal court to petty misdemeanors or any disorder which may take place within a State. I fail to see any reason for that; and if the chairman or any member of the committee is able to state any good reason why this section should remain in the bill, I shall be glad to withdraw my amendment. We authorize the President to call in the Army at any time to prevent disorder. We take away from the State government all its rights to regulate its own affairs and to maintain order within its boundaries.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Certainly.

Mr. BLACK. This would not deprive the State court of any jurisdiction over its own offenses.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Exactly. That is just the point. If an individual commits some act on a railway or on the track which may extend beyond the boundary of that State, he can immediately be taken by the Federal authorities and tried in a Federal court. We are transferring the jurisdiction of the Federal court for no reason whatever. Every State has ample laws for dealing with such acts.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. ESCH. What jurisdiction does the State have to punish interference with United States mails?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But you do not provide for that in this section. If there is any disorder, instead of first permitting local authorities or the governor of the State to deal with the situation, on the mere say so of an inexperienced, excitable, unlettered United States marshal the President may order the Regular forces there. We are not yet willing to extend to the military forces power to maintain order. There is no necessity for that. It is a vicious precedent to establish. There is no reason for putting this section in the bill, unless it is in keeping with all of the rest of the legislation that we have passed during this session carrying a lot of unnecessary matter, and let the Senate unravel it and send it back in proper shape. I think we have passed enough goulash legislation in this session, and it is time now that we keep our bills logical and to the point—let not every war measure contain provisions to enact into law pet fads and hobbies.

Mr. RAYBURN. Does not the gentleman know that the Senate has already passed this section that the gentleman seeks to strike out?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Well, that is one on the Senate. The Senate has enough to do now in straightening out our revenue measure, they had their troubles with our espionage bill, and the are certainly up against it in the food-control bill, because some Members here lost their heads last Saturday and tied up the whole food-control matter. If the chairman of the committee will give me one good reason why this section is necessary I shall withdraw my amendment, and I shall be glad to yield at this time. [Pause.] The silence is most eloquent. I urge the adoption of my amendment. The bill will carry out its purpose with the first paragraph. No good will come from it, and we establish a dangerous precedent. Surely the Members on the Democratic side of the House should support me in this effort to save to the several States the right to regulate and police their own territory.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LAGUARDIA) there were—ayes 2, noes 25.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. LAGUARDIA (interrupting the count). Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 8, line 2, after the word "authorized," strike out the remaining part of line 2 and all of lines 3, 4, 5, and 6, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "shall not by such compliance incur any of the civil or criminal pains, penalties, obligations, or liabilities that may otherwise be incurred under existing law by such preference of priority."

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is simply to limit the exemptions provided in the section to the specific preferences that are permitted by the President. I think that was the intention of the committee, but it seems to me that the language on page 8 will at least lend force to an argument that when a preference is granted by the President the complying with that order would exempt all of the companies involved in that exemption from all penalties of every nature and character without limitation.

Now, I have offered an amendment, which stipulates that when the President grants permission for a preferred shipment the company making such shipment shall be exempt from the penalties that might otherwise accrue by virtue of that preference. I believe the amendment I have offered conveys the idea meant to be conveyed by the committee, and I am sure any person reading the bill will see that if the President grants the privilege of giving priority to one shipment, then the railroad is exempted from existing penalties of every character, regardless of whether such penalties have any relation to the preference shipment.

Mr. RAYBURN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I will.

Mr. RAYBURN. I think the last lines in the last part of the paragraph ought to make it clear to the gentleman that his contention would not obtain. The last line says:

By reason of giving preference or priority in compliance with such order or direction.

It would certainly seem to me that would apply to the specific shipment under order of the President. Just like my colleague, if I did not take the language put in there to mean what the gentleman intends to write into the bill in the language he proposes I would be for his amendment, but I think it is in there.

Mr. JONES of Texas. The very language the gentleman quotes provides that all penalties are abolished by reason of the simple giving of one preference.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman permit a suggestion?

Mr. JONES of Texas. For a question. I desire to explain my amendment a little further.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not object to the gentleman doing so.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Very well.

Mr. ADAMSON. There are specific penalties in the law already against preferences and discriminations. If that language were stricken out it would leave the companies subject to those penalties if they obeyed the President and gave preference to shipments. This strictly exempts them when in obedience to orders they give such preferences to shipments, and it is absolutely necessary to relieve the carriers from the penalties denounced by law.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Does not the gentleman think the amendment does that clearly?

Mr. ADAMSON. What is the amendment?

Mr. JONES of Texas. It strikes out the provision after the word "authorize" and inserts:

Shall not by such compliance incur any of the civil or criminal pains, penalties, obligations, or liabilities that might otherwise be incurred under existing law by such preference or priority.

Mr. ADAMSON. There are more words but not better.

Mr. JONES of Texas. It has about four or five less words, and they are much clearer. The committee has intended to say one thing and said another. Evidently they intended to exempt from penalties growing out of any preference or priority, whereas the language means that if the President grants the company the right to one preference, that company is absolved from every penalty under existing law, and a company could then grant all the preferences it desired. The language of the bill does not carry a limitation, but provides that by reason of a company giving a preference it shall thereby gain absolution from any and all of its acts.

The language of the amendment that I have offered exempts from any pains and penalties that may have accrued by virtue of the preference given, but limits it to those pains and penalties and leaves the carrier subject to all other pains and penalties under existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from New York suggested an amendment to strike out the comma after the word "intimidation" in line 21, page 5. I do not think there is any objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman propose the amendment?

Mr. RAYBURN. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 21, after the word "intimidation," strike out the comma.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill as amended with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRISP, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill S. 2356 and had directed him to report the same back, with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the amendment and the bill to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. RAYBURN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill S. 2099, providing for the modification of the designs of the current quarter dollar.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 3548. An act providing for the modification of the designs of the current quarter dollar.

FRANK FUNKHOUSER.

Mr. PARK. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged resolution. I will try it again.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 108 (H. Rept. No. 90).

Resolved, That there shall be paid, out of the contingent fund of the House, the sum of $500 to Frank Funkhouser for clerical services rendered as clerk to the Committee on Mileage.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not object.

Mr. MADDEN. Why not.

The SPEAKER. It is privileged.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to ask a question or so. Can I do that?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. What does the clerk of the Committee on Mileage do? Is he regularly employed?

Mr. PARK. They have no clerk.

Mr. MADDEN. What does this resolution provide?

Mr. PARK. It provides $500 for the clerk who figures up the mileage for Members.

Mr. MADDEN. Every Member figures out his own mileage.

Mr. PARK. But he sees whether it is correct or not.

Mr. MADDEN. But how does he know?

Mr. PARK. He can tell from the railroad reports.

Mr. MADDEN. I will not object.

Mr. MEEKER. Is this agreeable to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD]?

Mr. PARK. I so understand. I submitted data showing this same matter has been passed before.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARK. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. Is this $500 going to a gentleman who is already the private secretary of a Member of this House?

Mr. PARK. I do not understand it so. He is a special man employed to do this work.

Mr. MEEKER. Is he the secretary of a Congressman?

Mr. PARK. I do not think he is.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, every Congressman makes out his own mileage report, and I have been informed that this goes to the private secretary of a Member of this House. I would like to know about it before we vote on the resolution.

Mr. PARK. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. DILL] is not here, but this gentleman came to my office and stated that he was the man who did the work. I do not understand that he is the secretary to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. DILL].

Mr. MEEKER. Did the gentleman who did the work tell you he was not secretary to a Member of Congress?

Mr. PARK. No. He did not tell me that.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. PARK. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 24, noes 7.

So the resolution was agreed to.

NIAGARA RIVER WATER POWER.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] is recognized.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I want to take up House joint resolution No. 109. And, Mr. Speaker, I want to ask unanimous consent in connection with this resolution that the Committee on Foreign Affairs be discharged from further consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 13, and then I want to get that substituted for the House resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] asks unanimous consent that the Committee on Foreign Affairs be discharged from further consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 13, and that it be substituted in lieu of House joint resolution No. 109. Is there objection to that?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I understand it is the purpose of the gentleman when the Senate resolution is presented for consideration in lieu of the House resolution, which has been given a privileged status, to strike out all after the enacting clause of the Senate resolution and substitute the House resolution?

Mr. FLOOD. I am going to ask unanimous consent to do that. I put it all together. And in addition to that, I ask unanimous consent that all after the enacting clause in Senate joint resolution No. 13 be stricken out and House joint resolution No. 109 be substituted in lieu of that part of it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia first asks unanimous consent to consider Senate joint resolution No. 13. There is no objection to that. Then he asks that all in the Senate resolution after the enacting clause be stricken out and the House bill considered as the substitute or amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. AUSTIN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, would that preclude the offering of the Senate joint resolution as a substitute for the House resolution when we take it up for consideration?

The SPEAKER. Technically speaking, it will be the Senate resolution before the House with the House resolution offered as a substitute.

Mr. AUSTIN. This unanimous consent agreement now would prevent the offering of the Senate joint resolution as a substitute for the House resolution?

Mr. STAFFORD. If the Chair will bear with me, it would not prevent any germane amendment or any amendment in the nature of a substitute which the House may wish to vote upon, in my opinion.

The SPEAKER. That is correct.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I would like to know precisely what the motion is.

The SPEAKER. In the first place, the gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to discharge the Committee on Foreign Affairs from the consideration of Senate joint resolution 13 and to consider that in lieu of the House joint resolution 109. Then he requests that everything in the Senate resolution after the enacting clause be stricken out and the House joint resolution be considered as a substitute.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That everything after the enacting clause in the Senate resolution be stricken out?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. And the House resolution substituted after the enacting clause of the Senate resolution?

The SPEAKER. Yes; that is it. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. This resolution is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 13) authorizing the Secretary of War to issue temporary permits for diversions of water from the Niagara River.

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized, upon such conditions as he may deem necessary to impose in the public interest, to issue permits, revocable at will, for the diversion of water in the United States from the Niagara River above the Falls for the creation of power to individuals, companies, or corporations which are now actually producing power from the waters of said river, which shall in no case exceed the capacity of the generating machinery of the permittee and tenant companies now installed and ready for operation, nor an amount sufficient to enable the permittee to supply the now existing hydroelectric demands of the individuals, companies, or corporations which said permittee and tenant companies are now supplying, but not in excess of the capacity of power-using appliances of said consumers now installed and ready for operation: Provided, That in no event shall the total quantity of water diverted in the United States from said river above the Falls for power purposes exceed in the aggregate a daily diversion at the rate of 20,000 cubic feet per second: Provided further, That the authority of the Secretary of War to issue permits under this resolution shall remain in force until the 1st day of July, 1918, and no longer, at the expiration of which time all permits granted hereunder shall terminate, unless sooner revoked; and any individual, company, or corporation, who, without such permit, or any such permittee, who, after the expiration or revocation of such permit, without further authority of Congress, diverts any part of said water of said river shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and be punished by a fine not exceeding $2,000 nor less than $500, or by imprisonment not exceeding 1 year nor less than 30 days, or both, in the discretion of the court; and each and every day on which such violation occurs or is committed shall be deemed a separate offense: And provided further, That where such violation is charged against the company or corporate body, the offense shall be taken and deemed to be that of any director, officer, agent, or employee of such company or corporate body ordering, directing, or permitting the same: And provided further, That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to make a comprehensive and thorough investigation, including all necessary surveys and maps, of the entire subject of water diversion from the Great Lakes and the Niagara River, including navigation, sanitary and power purposes, and the preservation of the scenic beauty of Niagara Falls and the rapids of Niagara River, and to report to Congress thereon on the earliest practicable date. To carry out the provisions of this paragraph, there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $25,000.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the committee amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, beginning on line 2, strike out all to and including the word "operation" in line 7; line 24, page 2, after the word "both," insert the words "such fine and imprisonment."

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CRISP). The question is on the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, the first committee amendment was not voted upon. The Clerk has read two different and separate amendments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report, then, the first committee amendment.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. He has reported that, but the House did not act upon it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the first committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 13, after the word "thereon," strike out the word "on" and insert in lieu thereof the word "at."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, line 13, by striking out the word "on" following the word "thereon" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "at."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, line 15, by striking out the word "paragraph" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "proviso."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I have had requests for an opportunity to speak on the bill.

Mr. FLOOD. I will, of course, do whatever the gentleman from Wisconsin thinks best to do.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. One gentleman has asked for 20 minutes.

Mr. FLOOD. But I would call attention to this fact: This resolution has got to go to the Senate, and there has to be a conference, and we have got to come back here. It is proposed to adjourn to-night.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that the joint resolution is being considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole and there is no general debate. The debate is under the five-minute rule.

Mr. CRAMTON. I have an amendment which I wish to offer.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I have a request for an opportunity to talk for 20 minutes on the part of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD].

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Is it on this bill?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. No.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Could not the gentleman, by unanimous consent, get the opportunity to talk after this resolution is disposed of?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That is the only request I have had.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that after the disposition of this resolution the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] be permitted to address the House for 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that after the consideration of this resolution the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] be permitted to address the House for 20 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MEEKER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, we arranged the other day that I was to be granted an hour on Tuesday next. Now, the plan is to practically have no one here on Tuesday of next week, and I ask unanimous consent to follow the gentleman from Indiana to-day and address the House for an hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman object to the request in behalf of the gentleman from Indiana that on the disposition of the resolution now pending the gentleman from Indiana shall have 20 minutes? Is there objection?

Mr. KEATING. Is it the intention, Mr. Speaker, to transact any business in the House after the disposal of this resolution?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair can not answer that.

Mr. KEATING. The chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs said something about a conference report on this particular resolution.

Mr. FLOOD. I do not think it is the purpose to adjourn the House very soon.

Mr. KEATING. What is to come before the House this afternoon after we complete the consideration of this resolution?

Mr. FLOOD. Probably a conference report on this resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD]?

Mr. RUBEY. Reserving the right to object, I would like to know on what subject the gentleman from Indiana wishes to address the House?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will state to the gentleman that my subject is political.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, may I say a word? When the other bill was up and the House was in committee, and the gentleman from Indiana had the right to address the House, I waived it at the request of gentlemen on this side, as it was important to go on with that bill, and thought he could get time after the disposition of that bill. It seems to me it would be unfair now to object.

Mr. KEATING. But I will serve notice that immediately after the completion of the gentleman's remarks you will have to keep a quorum here.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I want to suggest that the gentleman from Missouri——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER] asks unanimous consent that at the expiration of the 20 minutes of the gentleman from Indiana he be permitted to address the House for one hour in lieu of the hour allotted to him next Tuesday. Is there objection?

Mr. KEATING. I shall have to object to that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Colorado objects. The question is on agreeing to the last committee amendment to the Senate resolution.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to suggest a minor amendment. On line 23, of page 2, after the word "year," insert the word "and."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, line 23, page 2, by inserting, after the word "year," the word "and."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, if I may have the attention of the Chair for one question——

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, I renew my request for unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan has the floor.

Mr. CRAMTON. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. MEEKER. It is that following the address of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] I may be permitted to address the House for one hour this afternoon.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that, following the address of the gentleman from Indiana he may be permitted to address the House for one hour in lieu of the hour allotted to him for Tuesday. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the Senate resolution as amended.

The Senate resolution as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FLOOD, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the Senate joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

By unanimous consent, the House joint resolution on the same subject (H. J. Res. 109) was laid on the table.

SIXTH DISTRICT OF INDIANA.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the order of the House just granted the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, on June 26 a special election was held in the sixth congressional district of Indiana for the purpose of electing a successor to the late Daniel W. Comstock, deceased. Two candidates were nominated for the place, one Democratic and the other Republican. The Democratic candidate was the Hon. Finly H. Gray, of Connersville, who was a Member of this House during the Sixty-second, Sixty-third, and Sixty-fourth Congresses, and who was defeated by Judge Comstock for reelection to the Sixty-fifth Congress at the November election, 1916. The Republican candidate was Richard N. Elliott, also of Connersville.

The campaign for a period of 10 days preceding the election was a spirited one. Many Members of this House and of the Senate, representing both political parties, participated in the speaking. The issues discussed by them, as well as by the local speakers, were confined solely to national issues. No local or State matters entered into the consideration. This campaign and the election that followed attracted more than ordinary attention. It became national in character because the result would be looked upon by the country either as an indorsement or the failure of indorsement of the present administration of the Nation's affairs. Each party therefore put forth its best effort to win the election. The Democratic party managers, State and National, were especially active, so eager were they to be able to point with approval to this election as a confirmation that the sentiment of the people was in accord with the policies of the administration at this time. They not only drew heavily upon the best campaign speakers throughout the State and Nation for service in the district but the President of the United States was called upon, and he very generously responded by throwing his personal influence into the balance in favor of the election of the Democratic candidate. So anxious was the President for the election of Mr. Gray that he permitted memory for the time being to fail him and his regard for the truthful statement of facts to be thrown into the discard, as the following indisputable evidence amply discloses.

After the campaign had been on in the district about one week the opponents of Mr. Gray were using as an argument against his reelection to Congress that while a Member of this House he had not supported the war measures proposed by the administration during the last two years, and that as a matter of fact he had opposed all manner of preparedness during his incumbency as a Congressman. For the purpose of refuting this argument a friend of Mr. Gray, living in the district, addressed the following letter to the President of the United States:

CAMBRIDGE CITY, June 15, 1917.

President WOODROW WILSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Reports are being circulated in this district that the Democratic candidate for Congress, Hon. Finly H. Gray, did not give proper support during the past two years to your recommendations for preparedness and other war measures.

Will you kindly give me the facts in the matter?

Very truly, yours,

BENT WILSON.

To this letter the President very promptly replied, as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, June 19, 1917.

MY DEAR MR. WILSON: I am very glad, indeed, to reply to your letter of June 15, that the Hon. Finly H. Gray throughout his membership in the House has given the present administration the most generous and cordial support. It would afford me the greatest gratification to see him return to the House of Representatives.

Cordially and sincerely, yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

Mr. BENT WILSON,
Standard Manufacturing Co., Cambridge City, Ind.

These two letters were inserted by the Democratic managers in every paper in the district of consequence in three-quarter page advertisements in favor of the election of Mr. Gray.

Now, in order that the truth may be ascertained, let us examine the RECORD and see what "generous and cordial support" Mr. Gray gave to the "preparedness and other war measures" of the administration. Mr. Gray was a member of the Naval Affairs Committee in the Sixty-third Congress. The administration then was advocating the building of more battleships. A large majority of the committee was in favor of this program. Mr. Gray, supporting the minority report in opposition to building more battleships, made a speech against the administration's plan for an increase in the Navy, in which he declared that the principle advanced by the majority, of the necessity for such increase, was ridiculous and that the proposition was monstrous and absurd. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 63d Cong., 2d sess., pp. 7272, 7273.)

The above speech was delivered on April 25, 1914, and on the 28th day of the same month, while the same measure was under consideration in this House, Mr. Gray stated, among other things, that never before was there less liability of there being a war than to-day; that there was absolutely no reason for an increase in the Navy; and that the Mexican situation should not be used as an excuse for the enlargement of the Navy. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 63d Cong., 2d sess., p. 7378.)

At the second session of the Sixty-third Congress, when the question was whether two battleships should be built instead of one, Mr. Gray voted in favor of the building of one battleship. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 63d Cong., 2d sess., p. 8266.)

During the second session of the Sixty-third Congress an amendment was offered to the naval bill by Mr. PADGETT, chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee, proposing to apply the proceeds derived from the sale of battleships to Greece to the construction of one superdreadnaught as a measure of preparedness. This proposition was opposed by Mr. Gray and he voted against it. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 63d Cong., 2d sess., p. 10973.)

Mr. Gray also voted in favor of what was known as "the naval holiday bill," the same being a resolution providing for the suspension of naval construction for the period of one year. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 63d Cong., 2d sess., p. 480.)

Mr. DECKER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No; I have not time.

In the month of September, 1914, after "the sparks of the European war were beginning to fly everywhere," Mr. Gray declared, in a speech in this House, that he believed that the world respected the citizenship of this Republic and would continue so to honor and respect it. And he was still oblivious to any necessity for preparing ourselves for the worst. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 63d Cong., 2d sess., p. 15754.)

During the third session of the Sixty-third Congress Mr. Gray expressed his unalterable opposition to a world-power naval policy of the United States. The present administration at the time he made this declaration was advocating the building of four battleships. On the 5th day of February, 1915, at great length, Mr. Gray set forth his opposition to this scheme in a set speech in this House, in which he deplored the vast expenditure of public moneys that would be made if this plan should be carried out. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 63d Cong., 3d sess., pp. 3128 and 3129.)

During the same session the present administration was advocating the building of a hospital ship. This recommendation was opposed by Mr. Gray, and he spoke in favor of striking the item from the naval appropriation bill. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 63d Cong., 3d sess., p. 3143.)

On Friday, January 29, 1915, while this House had under consideration an appropriation bill for the naval service, Mr. Gray, in an extension of remarks on this measure, among other things, said that "the charge of military unpreparedness comes from the timid, who magnify dangers, and in part from the crafty and designing." His extension of remarks filed at that time was very lengthy, but from start to finish he opposes this administration's plan for increasing the Naval Establishment, and advocates a little Navy as being sufficient for all the needs of our country. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 63d Cong., 3d sess., App., pp. 325, 326, 327, 328.)

During the Sixty-third Congress it was proposed as a measure of preparedness to appropriate $700,000 for the building of airships. Mr. Gray opposed this proposition and voted against it. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 63d Cong., 3d sess., p. 2136.)

As a measure of preparedness this administration, during the third session of the Sixty-third Congress, asked that appropriation be made for two battleships. This also met with the opposition of Mr. Gray and he voted against it. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 63d Cong., 3d sess., p. 3152.)

On June 2, 1916, after the war in Europe had been on for nearly two years and when this administration was endeavoring to increase the appropriation for naval purposes, and such increase was under consideration in this House, Mr. Gray voted in opposition to the same. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 64th Cong., 1st sess., p. 9189.)

Mr. Gray not only consistently opposed an increase in the Navy but he likewise consistently opposed an increase in the Army Establishment. When it was proposed during the Sixty-fourth Congress to increase the strength of the standing Army to 250,000 men, his vote was cast in opposition to the measure. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 64th Cong., 1st sess., p. 7600.)

He also registered his vote against the proposition known as the volunteer-army plan recommended by the President of the United States, and the purpose of which was to increase the number and efficiency of the Regular Army. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 64th Cong., 1st sess., p. 7601.)

The present administration within the last two years advocated the building by the Government of a nitrogen plant for the purpose of manufacturing explosives as a measure of preparedness. This, too, met with the opposition of Mr. Gray. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 64th Cong., 1st. sess., p. 4730.)

As late as August 15, 1916, when the opposition to the increase in the Navy in this House was reduced to a minimum, Finly H. Gray was still found casting his vote with that small minority. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 64th Cong., 1st sess., p. 12700.)

And on this same day, in a speech delivered in this House, he declared, in opposition to the administration's naval building plan, that "military rivalry is the criminal folly of the nations." Also that he was "opposed to a naval policy looking to world power in war." Also "opposed to a naval policy looking to a contest for control of the seas." Also "opposed to any military policy for this Nation which will arouse distrust and apprehension against us, engender antagonism, animosity, and enmity toward us." Also "opposed to any military policy for this Nation calling for vast expenditures of money and burdensome taxation to maintain a menace to our peace, inevitably leading to war, and ultimately jeopardizing our very national existence." This speech was uttered by him in opposition to this administration's five-year building plan. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 64th Cong., 1st sess., pp. 12681, 12682, 12683, 12684, and and 12685.)

It seems to me that it is needless to multiply this evidence. Those who wish to pursue it further may do so, and I venture the assertion that during all the period of Mr. Gray's membership in this House at no time will he be found supporting either by vote or speech a single measure of preparedness, a single measure having for its purpose an increase in either the Army or Navy Establishments.

Since the declaration of war with Germany a vast majority of the Members on the Republican side of this House have unfailingly stood by the administration in every step proposed by it for the increase of the Army and Navy and for the appropriation of the vast sums of money necessary to accomplish the same; and in the consideration of all these great measures there has been found an entire absence of partisanship or any attempt to obtain party advantage on behalf of the Republicans in the House; and not one of these measures could have passed had it depended for its passage upon Democratic votes, notwithstanding the fact that the Democrats have outnumbered the Republicans in this House since this session of Congress began.

In view of all this it is most astonishing that the President of the United States should find it necessary to write the letter that he did write in support of the candidacy of Mr. Gray. Especially is this letter astounding in the light of the facts as disclosed by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to which I have alluded.

It seems passing strange that the absence of partisanship so marked in this House at the present time can not be emulated by the President of the United States.

Let us look for a moment to see how much influence the effort put forth by the President on behalf of Mr. Gray's candidacy had on the election in the sixth Indiana district. At the general election held in this district in November, 1916, Judge Comstock was elected over Mr. Gray by a plurality of 978 votes, out of a total vote of 49,000. At the special election held on last Tuesday Richard N. Elliott was elected over Mr. Gray by a majority of 2,736 out of a total vote of 31,500.

It will be seen by these figures that the majority given Mr. Elliott was nearly three times as large as the plurality given Judge Comstock over Mr. Gray. The vote cast was about 65 per cent of the normal vote of the district, and from the ratio of increase of the Republican majority over that of 1916, it will be readily seen that if the normal vote had been cast Mr. Elliott's majority would have been more than 4,000.

The sixth congressional district of Indiana comprises one of the richest farming and manufacturing sections in the United States, about half of its population being urban and the other half rural, and a more intelligent voting population can not be found anywhere in the United States.

I am content that the people shall determine the causes that brought about the result of the election in the sixth Indiana district. My only purpose in enumerating the facts herein is that the public may judge whether the President had any warrant under the facts for writing the letter that he did in support of the candidacy of Finly H. Gray.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Who told you that the President was in favor of that volunteer-army proposition that was beaten here on the floor of the House?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That was the report of the friends of the bill here.

Mr. GORDON. Who reported it?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It was repeated half a dozen times during the discussion that the President of the United States was in favor of it.

Mr. GORDON. Oh, name a witness who said that the President was supporting it.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The President of the United States was said to be in favor of it and against it, and finally was declared to be in favor of it.

Mr. GORDON. You are mistaken. Nobody declared that the President was in favor of it.

SOME BY-PRODUCTS OF PROHIBITION.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the order of the House the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER] is entitled to one hour.

Mr. MEEKER. I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, it will be impossible for me in the time that I have to go into a full discussion of the subject which I have announced to-day, "Some by-products of prohibition."

I yield to no man on the floor of this House as to the amount of time and earnest endeavor which has been spent in the last 10 years in the purpose of getting at the facts as to how society has conducted itself under different kinds of excise laws. I became interested in this subject primarily at the suggestion of the editor of a St. Louis newspaper, in which he asked that I make some investigations for the purpose of writing a series of articles for his paper. The result of that request and of the beginning of that investigation was that it was two years before I had anything whatever to say upon this subject. I started out to discover what the conditions really were. Since that time I have kept up the investigation, and shall continue so to do, for there is no greater question before the American people now than the working out of the problem of how to administer the excise laws of this country.

We are entering upon a new era. For the first time in history the Federal Government has taken the States at their word when they have said they wanted prohibition. But the States never required that their citizens should not purchase, keep, nor use liquors. Only the sale within the borders of the States was prohibited. Never was the purchase prohibited. Thereby hundreds of thousands of retail purchasers of drinks were converted into wholesale purchasers. Many retail liquor dealers were destroyed, and thousands of wholesalers, who have been shipping throughout the country for the last 25 years, growing in wealth and prosperity, were put into business.

A great many things have been going on. It is my purpose to give to the House, without very much comment, some of the things that I have painstakingly worked out from the best sources obtainable, as to what is actually occurring in these States as regards crime, pauperism, juvenile delinquency, and all these kindred subjects which are on the lips of every alleged reformer who has come to believe that the power of moral suasion is a failure, the minister who believes that the Gospel of Jesus Christ can no longer do what it was intended to do, and who has resorted to the system of the Pharisee and the Saducee, of saving society by law.

As I said, I will not have time to cover this ground in its entirety, but I have asked that I might extend my remarks in the RECORD. I made that request simply in order that I might put into the RECORD, practically without comment, for the thoughtful consideration of the Members of this House, some facts. They are not all of them down to the last minute, for the simple reason that we have had no census since 1910. I can not give you the exact figures on some of the data that I will submit at this hour to-day, for I am yet gathering data through the different departments of the Government. If there have been any errors made in the summaries, I shall indeed be grateful to any Member of the House who, after having read these remarks, will point out the error. For, gentlemen, we can get nowhere in the solution of any problem unless we face facts just as they are. This thing of men on either side of this question endeavoring to befog the issue, or cover up facts, or slur over things which may be unpleasant to their side, will get nowhere in the solution of this problem.

Now, gentlemen, there are a few things that are very evident to any thoughtful student in the investigation of the actions of men in this country, and one is that the average man does not want the other man to have a drink, but he does insist on having it for himself. You may go through the elections of the country, State, county, and municipal—and I have been in hundreds of them—and time after time it has been pointed out that the so-called prohibition amendments, offered generally by the Anti-Saloon League, always leave out the prohibition of the purchase of liquor, of the keeping of liquor in your own possession, and of its consumption. They say that it shall be prohibited except—and their exceptions are the things that make their speeches appear silly—except for mechanical, chemical, medicinal, and sacramental purposes.

This thing, that they have said kills more than any other one thing on earth, is very carefully protected for them at the hospitals, and it is very carefully safeguarded for them at the Lord's Supper. It is about time somebody was calling the attention of the people of this country to the fact that whenever men are denouncing what they call the worst evil on earth, but at the same time providing that they shall have it in the celebration of the Lord's Supper, in their hospitals and at their bedsides, that we should consider as to whether men in the exercise of their religious rites are worthy of any more consideration than they are in the exercise of their personal and social rights.

Now, what has been the result. As I said, it will be impossible for me to give you in the discussion of each one of these subjects I may touch upon all the data of this hour, but I will put them in the RECORD for you. I want you to take time and read them over.

If you will bear this one thing in mind it will aid you greatly in answering many questions which I frequently hear asked by opponents of the license system of handling liquors as beverages. If you will remember when trying to explain the enormous increase in the consumption of liquors in the United States since prohibition has been started, which no student can deny, where we have gone from an average consumption of about 17 gallons per capita in 1892, when this movement started, to an average per capita consumption of 22 gallons, when the question is asked, the old, old question: Well, why is that, and if that be true, why are liquor men opposed to it? A question that has been asked me a thousand times and one for a long time I did not understand—if you will keep in mind when you ask the question that in those States, counties, or municipalities when they enacted a law, they did not prohibit the purchase of liquor or its consumption, that they were never able to reach the man beyond their judicial jurisdiction who was permitted to sell liquor by the case or carload to anyone who would send the price; if you will remember that the men who drank beer by the stein, for which they paid a nickel, or by the bucketful for the family, that when prevented from getting it at the retail store they sent for it in bulk and got it by the case, when you remember that the man who drank whisky by the glass is compelled to buy it by the case, gallon, or barrel, when as you see the decline in the number of retailers, you see just about one wholesaler doing the business of every seven retailers who went out of business, you will begin to understand.

Then, in addition to that, you will remember the very careful, earnest efforts on the part of those leading "reformers," namely, the Anti-Saloon League, that they have always watched that the patent-medicine men should go scot free; that they have written into every amendment offered in any State that their law would not interfere with medicine, alcoholic medicine. Then when you remember that in addition to this there has never been a time that men who talk loudly in favor of prohibition for the other fellow, when you have pointed out to them what it would do in their local community, they have said, "Well, I can get mine." Then the assurance that men who speak for, vote for, and pass it violate the spirit of that law every day of their lives, you can understand something as to why this movement has gone as it has.

Now, then, you put to any of these men the question as to why they do not prohibit the purchase of liquor, and, gentlemen, if our fight is against anything, it is against alcoholism and not against institutions. All you may say, all you may shout from the housetops about the evils of the liquor business, unless you get down to the consumer and reach him, your work will have been in vain.

If you will go over, as I have done, the legislation of every State in this Union to see how the drinker has been protected, to see how when you drove out your local retailer, who, if he sold in violation of law, could be jailed and fined, and then the consumer put his order in a mail-order envelope and sent it across the State line, and in return the man on the other side could send to him all the, so-called, whisky money would pay for without a blush and without knowing fear as to what might be done to him, you will again understand. Then, if you will take the other natural law of bulk purchase and bulk consumption and apply it to the liquors as you do to cigars and candy or any other commodity, you will understand something of what I mean.

Now there is the other question which you frequently have put to you, if prohibition does not prohibit, and it is not intended to, Why do the liquor men fight it? It is not intended to keep the drinker from getting it, Anti-Saloon League men in Minnesota told the farmers. "You fellows will not suffer; you just close up the saloons and you can get it by mail order."

The superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League in South Dakota, when the bone-dry law was drafted in South Dakota, assured the farmers that if they would vote out the saloon they could still get theirs.

I do not care to use language on this floor proper to use toward the Anti-Saloon League, but I may sometime outside of the House. Now you say, "Why are all the liquor men against it?" They are not. You show me a mail-order whisky man who is not being attacked in his home county, his home State, where his place of business is located, who will make a contribution to an antiprohibition fund, and I will show you a snow-white crow. [Laughter.]

Let me put this simple question to you: Suppose instead of the retail-liquor business it was the retail grocers, and you had an election on in your home town to close up the retail grocery stores of that town. Which side of that question do you think Sears, Roebuck & Co. would take, and why? Would they give any money to keep the retail grocers doing business in town? That is not the way they make their living.

The closing of your home retail grocery store means that your money goes to Sears, Roebuck & Co. for your groceries. The building up of the mail-order whisky business, which, as I will show you from a report of the Interstate Commerce Commission of some years ago, is the child of the fraudulent prohibition which the people of this country believed was going to give them relief.

Let us take another phase of this subject which has never as yet been touched upon fully, and that is our good friend who is always so carefully protected in all prohibition statutes—alcohol for medicinal purposes. We had an Army bill up here not very long ago, and the gentlemen at the other end of the Capitol decided that inasmuch as the soldiers of the United States were to go out to fight for democracy on foreign soil, the way to start them would be to first muzzle them. So they passed a prohibition law for the soldiers.

One of the Members of that body who despises hypocrisy offered an amendment providing that during the war nobody should sell liquor to a Representative or a Senator, and on the spur of the moment it was adopted, for they could not back out. However, in about two hours' time following that they took the muzzle from the Representatives and Senators who remain here, but they left it on the soldier who has to go to fight for democracy. That is what I mean. You will never apply prohibition to yourself, and there are so many just such in this country that that is the reason your prohibition law does not do what it was promised it would do. Then here is our good old friend the patent-medicine man who is always protected by every prohibition law which goes on the statute books, for in face of the statement that alcohol and "demon rum" kill more than any other one thing, according to the reports of the gentlemen who make the speeches—in spite of all that alcohol must be preserved for the good brother in the church and for the sick! What has been the result of it? I have been pointing out to the people of this country for a long time the development of the so-called proprietary-medicine business. I obtained a few years ago from the State of Massachusetts an analysis of about 25 or 30 of these medicines that are advertised by the preachers and the drys, and the good women of the country, with all their curative powers, together with the photograph of some great statesman, taking up a quarter of a page in the daily newspaper, who desires to tell what it has done for him since his campaign was over; and the Rev. Dr. So-and-So gives his name in testimony of the wonderful curative power of whatever one of these he may choose to select. Just the publication of that little list started a furore all over this country, but we kept on digging around to find out how much there was of it. We have discovered, and for the first time I am able to give you a list, completed up to yesterday, of the patent medicines that are listed by the Department of Internal Revenue, together with their alcoholic content. All of those "medicines" escape under your prohibition laws, and there are 747 of them, and their alcoholic content runs all the way from eight-tenths of 1 per cent to 93½ per cent.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman mind stating which one has 93½ per cent? [Laughter.]

Mr. MEEKER. I think probably the gentleman knows, but for his benefit I shall say that it is one of about fifty different kinds of Jamaica ginger. I showed this to a very ardent "dry" the other day. When he looked it over and saw Jamaica ginger, he said, "Why that is what I use all of the time." [Laughter.] I could take your time for the rest of the hour going into this list, but it will be published in the RECORD so you can take your choice, though most of you possibly have your favorites, I presume, as the good ladies have. Here is a business that is to-day in the United States capitalized at $71,000,000, while the distilling business is capitalized at only $91,000,000. In other words, in 20 years' time these men are now within $20,000,000 of the capitalization of all of the distilleries in the United States, and every law you put on the statute books that closes down the brewery and the wine maker and the distiller makes an exception in favor of these. They do not pay one cent of tax to this Government on their product, paying a tax only on the alcohol that goes into their product. It goes into your home and yours and yours. If I could take the time to-day to read to you the directions on the bottle from one of them—Hinckley's Bone Liniment, manufactured in the State of Michigan, with 87 per cent of alcohol, which gives instructions on the bottle as to how much the mothers shall put into the milk they give to the babies—you would not longer wonder where alcoholism is coming from in this country. Most of you remember a few years ago a man who is dead now—God rest his soul—who manufactured the Wine of Cardui, at Chattanooga, Tenn., a concoction that carried about 28 per cent of alcohol. He was an ardent prohibitionist, fighting the breweries, fighting wine, and all these other things, and was a member of the Methodist Book Concern of the United States, and treasurer of the Methodist Temperance Committee, and vice president of the Anti-Saloon League! Then there is this man whom we found in Michigan who manufactured Hinckley's Bone Liniment. He put up all of the money they asked him to put up to put Michigan "dry" last year. You will also find in here the product of another druggist or manufacturer in the city of Lansing, Mich. I purchased a bottle of it from his window display on the Sunday before the election in Michigan, a concoction called "Beef, Iron, and Wine," which contains 16½ per cent alcohol, and he was the leading "dry" of the city.

Now, gentlemen, I am talking to the sound, hard sense of this House, and I ask you men, not in a moment of excitement, to go back to your homes and ask yourself this question: Is this legislation which we have been enacting in these last years, which has been the guaranty of protection to these men as against all others, entirely proper, when these very men go into your homes with these drinks, and that is all they are, carrying 16, 18, 20, 30, 40, 60 per cent of alcohol, and you see your family using it, is this reform legislation? I say that when men are striking at alcoholism and at the same time make a special favorite of the patent medicine man they are committing a crime in the name of reform.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEEKER. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is not this covered in some way by the pure food and drugs act?

Mr. MEEKER. We went to the Department of Internal Revenue. We could not get it; this was never obtained before. Never was that list given out until last week. I went to the Agriculture Department and made a request that under the food and drug act they give me the list. They had no such list in their office, and I furnished them the first list they ever had.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Assuredly those percentages up to 95 per cent would be in violation of existing law.

Mr. MEEKER. Not for medicines.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, before proceeding I would like to have some information. We do not want Pennsylvania to be left off that list. There is a bitters made up there called Hostetter's Bitters——

Mr. MEEKER. The gentleman will find it here.

Mr. FOCHT. Will the gentleman let me know about that?

Mr. MEEKER. The gentleman can read it in the RECORD to-morrow.

Mr. FOCHT. Very well.

Mr. MEEKER. Gentlemen will find all their favorites here. [Laughter.] Now, then, we turn to these articles of drink about which all this hullabaloo is made. Here is a report from the Department of Internal Revenue on them. What do we find? Beers run up to 5.95, and so forth; wines to about 10 and 11 per cent, champagnes to 13 and 14 per cent, Scotch whisky to 45 and absinthe 53 per cent, and the American whisky bottled in bond 50 per cent, and at the same time men come in on the floor of this House and vote to exempt alcoholic medicines. I excuse them, because I believe they are ignorant; I do not believe any informed man could continue to vote to strike down the beers and wines and light wines and champagnes and always legislate in favor of patent medicines and see to it that the laws we draft are for the exemption of a patent medicine, even though it has 93 per cent alcohol, more than twenty times as much as beer.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires to notify the gentleman, as requested; he has consumed 30 minutes.

Mr. MEEKER. Gentlemen, I am going to put in the RECORD for you this information, and much more. I am not going to take up any more of your time on this phase of the subject. I believe that there is no measure before us to-day to which we have so closed our eyes. We have been dominated by a gang of religious bigots, who are more dangerous to the liberties of America than beer or whisky ever will be.

I would rather have a nation of free men learning to exercise the habits of temperance than to have a nation dominated by religious fanatics who are attempting to run the Government. The church under some guise or other has attempted to get control of every nation in history, and it is making its fight here now with more than a thousand preachers in this country to-day who are professional lobbyists, with their headquarters here, who sit in the gallery to see which way we vote in committee so they can send it back home, the only organization that ever sent out to candidates for Congress a request for a secret pledge before they had been nominated. Now, I do not need to go any further in explanation of that. I received one such letter, and it was not the only copy. Men who will attempt to bind a man in secret on any legislation are a free government's deadliest enemies, but if they call it "reform" they get away with it. I put it up to the men of this House this afternoon that hereafter whenever you vote to strike down these beers, light wines, champagnes, and whiskies and by your legislative enactment make an exemption of those "medicines," never go again and look into the faces of your family and say you are fighting "booze" in this country. The only reason, as I said a moment ago, I have had any patience with the legislators of this country is because I believe they have been ignorant as to the facts. You put this prohibition amendment over as it is now being proposed and you are making a $70,000,000 capitalization they now have worth $700,000,000 inside of two years.

The way you have drawn your laws they, the medicine men, go scot free. Further than that, you would no more permit a brewer to send a circular into your home advising you to use a bottle of beer a day and give another bottle to your baby than you would let him send poison. But you will put one of these bottles up on the shelf with full instructions as to how much to give the baby, how much an adult is to take, and if mother is not watching you can get a good jag on before she can get to you. In the name of reform, in the name of common sense, in the name of common decency I say to the men of this House this afternoon if you let your prohibition amendment go on with the Federal exemption to patent medicines, you have made a free gift to all men who shall go into the conversion of alcohol into "medicine" instead of beer and wine and whisky. Now, let us come just a little nearer to the situation we are now facing. Gentlemen, I yield to no man at either end of the Capitol when it comes to tireless effort since the trouble broke out in Europe until now to maintain the honor and dignity of this Nation of ours.

I do not belong to the party of the administration. I come from a district where, before we entered the war, thousands of people had their sympathy with one of the belligerents, and they were just as much entitled to hope that their brothers and cousins and relatives would win, until they understood the real situation, as were the men on the floor of this House who were denouncing what they were pleased to call hyphenism. I never could reply to any of those, because I thought they were too silly to answer. The men who came here, besides those who came from England and Scotland, to build this Nation were just as good and just as patriotic as were those who spoke the English language. This is not the land of the men who came from any one country.

It was a little difficult out in my district to make the people understand just what was the issue when war was declared. Many did not understand exactly why we had entered the conflict. Some talk was too ethereal. But when the issue was once clearly drawn, the people of my district and of my city rallied to the defense of the flag as quickly and as loyally as any other group of men in America. [Applause.]

My correspondence for the last three months has been one of constant effort to make these men understand just what the situation is. There has been no one thing that I have said oftener in my letters to them than the calling their attention to the fact that this is a free land. That this is a land where we recognize the rights of every man so long as he conducts himself properly; that the flag under which we live is the only flag under which all men can gather together, and where the majority is pledged to defend the rights of the minority [applause], a thing that has been forgotten in these days.

I am not condemning anybody, but it is a puzzle to me how men can walk down to the well of this House at the beginning of a session and, lifting their hands, swear by God Almighty to uphold and defend the Constitution, the only mainstay of our Government, and then turn around and vote for things that they say are unconstitutional.

Gentlemen, the only anchor of national solidarity is the fidelity of this House to the immortal Constitution of these United States. These men had begun to understand the situation, when here on last Saturday night, without a moment's warning—and I am not going to say anything about agreements made in caucus, as that is for the gentlemen who made the agreements to settle among themselves—in a frenzy of crocodile-tear shedding and ignorant voting, without thought of what it would mean in the question of our national life just now, lost their heads, some of them looking into the galleries to see if the whip was there, and "went through," voting for "prohibition."

Gentlemen, I am talking to you this afternoon on the most serious issue that now confronts us. The question at this moment in this Nation is not food control, it is not the railroad problem, it is not the draft, it is not the enrollment nor the shipping of men. We face the question to-day as to whether there is enough patience, there is enough statesmanship, there is enough courage in the men of the American Congress to keep from thrusting a straightforward insult into the face of millions of people of this country who are just as honest, who are just as patriotic, who are just as loyal to the flag, and who, thank God, if they are called upon will pour out their blood to keep this a free country.

Now, think. We say that this is a religious democracy, and we boast of it. You undertake at this time to legislate some certain religion out of existence and you would have trouble. But if this sort of legislation keeps on it will not be many years until it will be easy to legislate sects out of this country. This is an industrial democracy. You have no more right to tell your neighbor what he shall do to earn a livelihood than he has to tell you what you shall do. This is an educational democracy. No man or set of men can change the educational program of America. This is, at the same time, a social as well as a political democracy. We have men on the floor of this House who represent certain parties in whose doctrines we say we do not believe, but I rather doubt it when we say we do not. We are more socialistic to-day than we have ever been, and we denounce socialism with more vehemence. I believe the doctrine of socialism is dangerous to the American Government, but I hope the time will never come when I will ask that a Socialist be voted out of Congress because I do not like his politics.

Gentlemen, this bill as it is being proposed and considered to-day, means what? That the man under his own vine and fig tree, with his own apples, or his own grapes, or his own barley can not make for himself wines or beer. We step in and say thus to him under the hypocritical guise of "food control." But the exponents of this bill Saturday night could not cover up their real purpose. It was to put over a prohibition measure in the guise of a food control. Never will the time come when by legislation you can say that a man shall not take his products and convert them into drink as he chooses. There was a time when everybody did his own distilling, brewing, and wine making. There was more drunkenness on the average when everybody did their own distilling than there is now.

Let me call your attention to this, gentlemen. Drinking is increasing in this Nation, but drunkenness is decreasing. Temperance has come, as have all the virtues, by moral development. By an orderly program men have changed their habits of life. They have not been changed by legislation.

When the bill was passed on Saturday night it was passed in such a way as to make it absolutely impossible for these millions of men at the furnaces—furnaces which, if you put a Member of Congress in front of them four or five minutes he would not be bigger than a crackling after a week's boiling—to get their beer. Men yesterday struck in one of the great mills of New Jersey because they could not be supplied with beer while they worked before their furnaces. We have said to those men, the brawn of this country, the hundreds and thousands and millions of these men, who are just as sober and just as patriotic as any man who sits on the floor of this Congress, that the drink they have used in their work in those great plants shall be denied them, while at the same time we call upon them to produce the enormous output of materials absolutely necessary for winning the war. And that in the face of the fact that the English Government, which has tried some of this same kind of "sissy" legislation, has been compelled within the last few weeks to change its order and permit an increase in the output of beer for the working men of England who are now complaining; to provide these men with this drink, that they might keep them at work to carry on the war.

Not only that, but you men know it just as well as you know that you are here, and there is not a man here to-day who would get on the floor of this House and deny what I am now going to say to you—you know when you have denounced drunkenness, calling us a nation of drunkards, calling our soldiers drunkards, it is an insult to the American people; it is a slander on the American soldier.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. MEEKER. I can not yield now.

Mr. KEATING. I thought you wanted some one to deny what you said.

Mr. MEEKER. Wait until I put it to you. There are millions of individuals in this country who use beer every day.

Mr. KEATING. Let me answer your question.

Mr. MEEKER. No; I refuse to yield.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. MEEKER. I put the question whether any man here would deny that the American people who use beer are as good morally as the gentleman from Colorado?

Mr. KEATING. The gentleman has made the statement here repeatedly that the advocates of prohibition have described the American people as drunkards and the American soldiers as drunkards. I have heard no such statement as that.

Mr. MEEKER. Will you take the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for it? That is all.

Mr. KEATING. You will not find it if you take the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. MEEKER. I refuse to yield.

Mr. KEATING. Show me where the American people and the American soldiers have been denounced.

Mr. MEEKER. I do not yield to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. MEEKER. Now, gentlemen, when you are facing this issue, remember that during the past week men have been pleading with representatives of great industrial organizations in this country that they give Congress a little time to readjust itself. We to-day, above all other times, can not afford to make our own so-called democratic institutions a laughingstock to the men who are drafted to go to the other side of the sea to defend democracy. We are striking now at the foundation of free government. I am not concerned about this financial question; that can be easily settled. Two hundred million dollars on crude oil will pay half the bill, $100,000,000 on newspapers and magazines will take the rest of it, and another $100,000,000 on patent medicines and you have got your revenue.

Mr. BURNETT. How about two or three hundred millions on munition factories?

Mr. MEEKER. All right. Pile it on and see how high it will blow you.

Mr. BURNETT. That is where it should go.

Mr. MEEKER. You put it on on crude oil and your Anti-Saloon League will not last two days. You take the support of the Standard Oil away from the Anti-Saloon League and you will not have a league. And yet men continue to prate that they are the friends of labor and at the same time to legislate under the direction of an organization that is backed and owned by labor's "great friend," whose record in Colorado we all know—Mr. Rockefeller and his "friends" of labor, working together under the direction of the agents of the concern that has always assisted labor—with a shot gun.

Gentlemen, as we are passing through these days here, we had just as well solve this problem now as in the future. Some men are foolish enough to believe that by legislative enactments they are going to reverse the laws of fermentation, the laws of distillation, and the laws of human desires. Of course we will tackle anything these days—once. Nations have tried that in the past. Sweden, years ago, attempted absolute prohibition. What was the result? Her distilled spirits went out by fiat of the Government. The people of Sweden then began doing just what the people of prohibition States are doing now; they began to make distilled spirits at home. Without casting any reflection whatever upon that people—and I speak now only as a student of affairs—the man in his Swedish home learned to distill his alcohol from anything he had that contained alcohol. We know the penalty that that nation has paid by becoming a nation more addicted to straight alcohol than any other nation on the face of the earth. Sweden is now striving to struggle back again and once more get control of this great business.

Now, I want to say this to the men on the floor of this House: I have some patience with the man who talks prohibition and practices it. I have less with the man who talks it but lives as wet as the sea. The men who talk prohibition and send liquor to their friends are beneath the contempt of decent men. We men are introducing a program that bids for a universal violation of the law. In defiance of the law men and women will continue to exercise their God-given right. I wish to say, and plead as I say it, that in this hour, when we need as we have never needed before the sympathy, the cooperation, the good will of every man in this Nation, it behooves us to move with care in legislation. You will not stop drunkenness, gentlemen; you will not stop intemperance; you plan your legislation whereby these patent-medicine men and the wine men will be the sole beneficiaries of all the demand for stimulants. The thing that shocks me is that men will not see that when they exempt these "medicine" men from taxation they permit them in the name of "medicine" to put that amount of alcohol into what they sell, which, if put into any other drink, would drive the producer out of the country under the whip of public scorn. You would buy that by the bottle to put in your home, and you would say to yourselves, we are fighting "demon rum." Listen: If the principle of prohibition is right, we should enact it into law, and we should enforce that law if it takes a standing army to do it. If the principle of prohibition is wrong, we should oppose it on the ground of principle and not as a matter of dollars and cents, not as a matter of saving any man's commodity.

Oh, the men who came here from France, Germany, Italy, and Austria, and all those other lands, were told they were coming to a land of freedom. They believed it, and they were right, and the man who stands to-day to fight for his individual rights in this country is this Nation's best American. If this is not a nation that guarantees men their individual rights in the exercise of the pursuit of happiness, in the exercise of their legitimate tastes and desires, our claim of a free Government is a farce and our flag is a sham.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MEEKER. Not now.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Just on the matter he is discussing?

Mr. MEEKER. Not now. I decline to yield. We men here and now, as we are assembled in this Congress, should be giving our consideration, not to the whim of some alleged "reformer" who, if his trade was taken from him, would be looking for another job to-morrow. Abe Martin said, "There ain't nothin' in tendin' to other folks' business unless you are paid for it." That is all there is in this "reform" movement. Men who are benefiting by this alleged "reform" and "uplift campaign" are perfectly willing that the brethren should remain about the corridors of the sanctuary of the Capitol.

Gentlemen, this Nation for the first time is awake to the menace and threat of prohibition. Yield on this, and we can not longer be called upon to defend religious rights. We can not longer be called upon to protect men in the exercise of their political rights. We can not longer be called upon to protect men in their industrial rights. We con not longer be called upon to offer ourselves as a sacrifice to defend the institution which we know as the great American Republic. Prohibition is the dagger in the hand of religious fanaticism and commercial greed that, in the name of reform, is to be driven into the heart of American liberty. It is the poison gas that would kill men's desires for liberty. Men, under the guise of saving their brothers, when they themselves refuse to be saved, are to call in a policeman and a court to do what the Son of God came to do. Men, under the guise of reform, in the pay of industries whose stocks will be worth ten to one by the special protection which "reformers" are now giving them, men made dupes and supers of a group of individuals in this country who know that whenever this prohibition fight is settled and the people go back again to looking after the general affairs of the Nation, will get what is coming to them; men who suddenly became interested in the Anti-Saloon League when a woman with a pen made them talk for the first time; men who claim to be the social uplifters of the world while their paid agents shoot down men and women in the hills of Colorado because they want better wages. And yet men come on this floor and work with such agents while boasting of being friends of organized labor.

We are passing through the era of the combination of religious fanaticism, public ignorance, and commercial corruption. The gentleman in New York provides a fund, the gentlemen around Washington head the army, the shouters are made up of the well-meaning people who have not studied the question—the masses of them—and the work that is done is always to specially protect the gentleman who makes it from eight-tenths of 1 per cent to 93½ per cent, and puts it into the home and instructs that it be given to the babies in the name of medicine, reform, and religion. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I wish to insert here a considerable amount of general information which has been of service to me in the study of the subject now under discussion. I have no comment to make upon the data here offered. I submit it solely for the purpose of providing my fellow Members with some material which they possibly do not now possess.

As a matter of handy reference I insert first the last census report on population by States:

I next insert the prohibition legislative history of the several States:

Alabama adopted prohibition by legislative enactment in 1908; repealed it in 1911; again adopted it in 1915 by legislative enactment, to become effective July 1, 1915.

Arizona adopted prohibition by popular vote November 3, 1914. The law became effective January 1, 1915.

Arkansas adopted prohibition by legislative enactment in 1915. Law became effective January 1, 1916.

Colorado adopted prohibition by constitutional amendment in 1914 by popular vote. Law became effective January 1, 1916.

Connecticut adopted prohibition in 1854; repealed it in 1872.

Delaware adopted prohibition in 1855; repealed it in 1857.

Georgia adopted prohibition in 1907. Law became effective January 1, 1908.

Idaho adopted prohibition in 1915. Law became effective January 1, 1916.

Illinois adopted prohibition in 1851; repealed it in 1853.

Indiana adopted prohibition in 1855. Declared unconstitutional. Adopted by legislative enactment in 1916, to go into effect April, 1918.

Iowa adopted partial prohibition in 1855. Full prohibition in 1884. Mulct law in 1893. Prohibition reenacted in 1915. Has never been repealed, but a statute known as the mulct law was later enacted, which suspended the prohibitory law, but which has lately been repealed, rendering the prohibitory law again operative after January 1, 1916.

Kansas adopted constitutional amendment in 1880.

Maine adopted prohibition in 1846; repealed in 1856; reenacted prohibition in 1858.

Maryland adopted prohibition in 1855; only a few months' trial; repealed in 1855.

Massachusetts adopted prohibition in 1852; repealed it in 1868; readopted in 1869; repealed in 1875.

Michigan adopted prohibition in 1855; repealed it in 1875; readopted in 1916, law to go into effect in 1918.

Mississippi adopted prohibition in 1908.

Montana adopted prohibition in 1916, law to go into effect in 1918.

Nebraska adopted prohibition in 1855; repealed it in 1858; readopted in 1916.

New Hampshire adopted prohibition in 1855; repealed it in 1903.

New York adopted prohibition in 1855. Declared unconstitutional.

North Carolina adopted prohibition January 1, 1908. Law went into effect January 1, 1910.

North Dakota had a prohibition provision in the constitution when admitted into the Union in 1890.

Ohio adopted prohibition in 1855; annulled this by license tax law. Defeated proposed constitutional prohibition by 83,000 majority in 1914, and at the same time adopted a constitutional provision (by a majority of 83,000) which prohibits the Legislature of Ohio from enacting a county unit law.

Oklahoma had a prohibition provision in constitution when admitted into the Union in 1907.

Oregon adopted prohibition in 1914; effective January 1, 1916.

Rhode Island adopted prohibition in 1852; repealed it in 1863; readopted it in 1866; repealed it in 1889.

South Carolina adopted prohibition in 1915; went into effect in 1916.

South Dakota had a prohibition provision in the Constitution when admitted into the Union in 1890; repealed same provision in 1896; again passed prohibition law November 7, 1916.

Tennessee adopted prohibition by legislative enactment in 1909, law going into effect July 1 of the same year.

Vermont adopted prohibition in 1850; repealed in 1903.

Virginia adopted prohibition in 1914; effective November 1, 1916.

Washington adopted prohibition November, 1914. The law went into effect January 1, 1916.

West Virginia adopted constitutional amendment for prohibition by popular vote in November, 1912; went into effect July 1, 1914.

Wisconsin adopted prohibition in 1855; vetoed by governor.

MORTALITY.

Here are the mortality statistics as taken from pages 19, 20, 21, and 22 from the Thirteenth Annual Report, Department of Commerce, Bureau of the Census, 1912. The reader is requested to give special attention to number 56 of the report and then to consider what somebody, in the name of reform, has been doing to the truth:

Mortality statistics, 1912.

[Department of Commerce, Bureau of the Census. Thirteenth Annual Report.]

DEATHS (EXCLUSIVE OF STILLBIRTHS) AND DEATH RATES PER 100,000 POPULATION, BY CAUSES, ACCORDING TO THE DETAILED INTERNATIONAL LIST, FOR THE REGISTRATION AREA: 1909 TO 1912.

The causes of death originally classified according to the first revision of the International List, which was in effect for the years 1900 to 1909, are rearranged, as far as practicable, to correspond with the second revision, in effect Jan. 1, 1910. Changes depending upon new titles or markedly affecting the comparability of the figures are indicated by asterisks (*) following the titles, and reference should be made to the statements in the note on Changes in Classification at the end of this table.

MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE.

Pages 29, 30, 31, 32, and 33 of Bulletin No. 96 (Second Edition, Revised and Enlarged) Marriage and Divorce, 1887–1906, Department of Commerce, Bureau of Census, give the latest available data from the court records as to causes of divorce:

Marriage and Divorce, 1887–1906.

[Department of Commerce, Bureau of the Census, Bulletin No. 96 (Second Edition, Revised and Enlarged).]

STATISTICAL SUMMARY.

An examination of these tables shows that although among the several States the legal causes of divorce differ widely in number and phraseology, yet they are readily classifiable under a few broad heads. The classification which was adopted by the Commissioner of Labor in 1887, and which has been followed in the present investigation, is described in the following statement:

"1. Adultery.—Includes this cause only.

"2. Cruelty.—Includes cruelty, extreme cruelty, repeated cruelty, intolerable cruelty, intolerable severity, cruel and abusive treatment, cruel and inhuman treatment, cruel and barbarous treatment, attempt to take life, indignities rendering life intolerable, excesses and outrages, treatment endangering reason, treatment injuring health, violence endangering life, etc.

"3. Desertion.—Includes abandonment, absence for a period of years, willful desertion, utter desertion, etc.

"4. Drunkenness.—Includes habitual or continued drunkenness, habitual or continued intemperance, habitual or continued intoxication, habitual use of opium, morphine, chloral, or other like drugs, etc.

"5. Neglect to provide.—Includes nonsupport, willful neglect, refusal to provide, failure to provide, etc.

"6. Combinations of preceding causes, etc.—Includes a combination of two or more classified causes, or one or more classified causes with some minor cause or causes.

"7. All other causes.—Includes, whether occurring separately or in combination, conviction of felony, impotency, insanity, imprisonment in penitentiary, incompatibility of temper, mental incapacity, pregnancy before marriage, voluntary separation, other minor causes not here enumerated, and unknown causes."

The number of divorces granted for each of these different classes of causes is shown by divisions and States for the period 1887 to 1906 is shown in the tables which follow. The relative importance of these different classes of causes is shown in the following table, which distributes the divorces, classified in accordance with the party to which granted, by cause.

The most common single ground for divorce is desertion. This accounted for 38.9 per cent of all divorces granted in the period 1887 to 1906; for 49.4 per cent, or almost one-half, of those granted to the husband in this period, and for 33.6 per cent, or one-third, of those granted to the wife.

The next most important ground for divorce is, for husbands, adultery; and for wives, cruelty. Of the divorces granted to husbands, 28.7 per cent were for adultery of the wife; and of those granted to wives, 27.5 per cent were for cruelty on the part of the husband. Only 10 per cent of the divorces granted to wives were for adultery of the husband; and 10.5 per cent of the divorces granted to husbands were for cruelty on the part of the wife.

Drunkenness was the alleged sole ground for divorce in 5.3 per cent of the cases in which the wife brought suit, and in 1.1 per cent of the cases in which the suit was brought by the husband.

During the 40 years from 1867 to 1906 the relative importance of these different causes for divorce underwent some change, as is indicated by the table which follows, which gives the distribution of divorces by cause for each of the 5-year periods into which the 40 years are divided.

The general tendency during the 40 years from 1867 to 1906, as shown by the table referred to, has been toward an increase in the relative importance of the grounds which involve the less serious offenses. A comparison of the earliest 5-year period, that from 1867 to 1871, with the latest, that from 1902 to 1906, shows that adultery has decreased in relative importance as a cause, while cruelty has increased. Of the divorces granted to husbands in the earlier period, 38.6 per cent were for adultery and 4.2 per cent for cruelty, while in the later period 27 per cent were for adultery and 12.5 per cent for cruelty. Similar changes are exhibited by the figures for divorces granted to the wife; the percentage for adultery decreased from 18.4 to 9.6, while that for cruelty increased from 17.7 to 28.9.

The changes in the relative importance of the causes have resulted because divorces granted for adultery have not increased as rapidly as those granted for less serious causes. This is indicated by the following table, which shows the increase in the number of divorces granted on the different grounds:

Divorces granted for adultery increased 270.8 per cent between the period 1867 to 1871 and the period 1902 to 1906, which was considerably less than the increase for any other class. Divorces for neglect to provide during the same period increased by the enormous percentage of 1,331.4, and divorces for cruelty by 1,035.3 per cent.

The greatest rate of increase exhibited by the table is that for divorce granted to the husband on the ground of cruelty. In the five years from 1867 to 1871 only 800 divorces were granted to the husband on that ground, but in the five years from 1902 to 1906 the corresponding number was 13,678, representing an increase of 12,878, or 1,609.8 per cent. The smallest rate of increase during this period for any of the distinctive causes was in divorces granted to the wife on the ground of the husband's adultery. Such divorces increased to 237.1 per cent.

The differences in the rates of increase are graphically brought out by table on page 5040, which shows the fluctuations from year to year in the number for some of the principal classes of divorce.

In addition to illustrating the fact that the divorces for adultery are not increasing as rapidly as those for other causes, this diagram shows also that of the common grounds for divorce adultery is the only one for which the number of divorces granted to the husband exceeds the number granted to the wife. The exact figures upon this point are given in the following table for the period 1887 to 1906.

It will be noted from this table that in 90,890, or 59.1 per cent, of the total number of divorces granted for adultery alone the offense was committed by the wife, and in 62,869, or 40.9 per cent, of the total number it was committed by the husband.

The difference may be attributed to the probability that the offense when committed by the wife is less likely to be condoned and perhaps more likely to be discovered. In England, where every applicant for absolute divorce must prove adultery committed by the other party, the husband need prove this one offense only, while the wife must prove in addition some aggravating circumstance, such as cruelty or desertion. In this country the laws of the several States, with some exceptions, make no distinction between husband and wife in this respect; but public sentiment doubtless condemns the offense in the wife more strongly than in the husband, and possibly the courts are in some degree influenced thereby.

Intemperance as a cause.—Under drunkenness in the classification thus far presented are included only those divorces for which this was the sole ground. During the period 1887 to 1906, as the figures have shown, 36,516 such divorces were decreed, and of this number 3,436, or 9.4 per cent, were granted to the husband and 33,080, or 90.6 per cent, to the wife. They formed about 1 per cent of all divorces granted to the husband and about 3 per cent of the total number granted to the wife, and these proportions have remained practically constant throughout the period for which the statistics are available.

These figures, of course, do not represent the total number of cases in which intemperance was a cause, but only those in which it was the sole cause. In a second class of cases intemperance was a direct legal ground, not alone, but in combination with other grounds; while in the third class of cases, though not alleged at all as a direct legal ground, yet it was present as an indirect contributing cause.

The number of cases in which it was a direct cause in combination with others was determined with practical exactness in the same manner that the number in which it was the sole cause was determined.

The attempt was made to ascertain also the number of cases in which intemperance, although not a direct ground for divorce, was an indirect contributing cause. The method pursued was to include in this class each case in which the papers showed that intemperance existed, provided that this case had not already been included among those in which intemperance was a direct cause, either alone or in combination.

The cases that are not included in any of the three classes are, therefore, those in which the papers did not show the existence of intemperance either as a direct or as an indirect cause. In some of these cases the record was so meager that the absence of any mention of intemperance would justify no conclusions, but in the majority of instances it would create a strong presumption that intemperance did not exist, or was not a contributing cause.

The results of this tabulation are shown for continental United States in the following table:

According to the evidence contained in this table, intemperance was present in about 1 divorce case out of every 5. It occurred far less frequently, however, in those cases where the husband obtained the divorce because of the misconduct of the wife. In such cases intemperance existed in only about 1 case out of 16. Where the husband was at fault, on the other hand, intemperance was present in about 1 case out of 4.

Both in cases where the husband was the guilty party and those where the wife was at fault intemperance was more frequent as an indirect contributing cause than as a direct principal cause. Two explanations suggest themselves: Intemperance is not recognized in all States as a direct ground for divorce, and even in States where it is so recognized a degree of intemperance insufficient to support a petition based upon this ground may be brought out in the progress of the case because of its persuasive effect upon the court.

The character of the principal causes in the cases where intemperance was an indirect cause is indicated in the table which follows.

As might naturally be expected this table shows that intemperance was most frequently present as an indirect cause in those cases where the wife secured the divorce because of the cruelty of the husband. In 1 case out of every 3 of this class intemperance was present as an indirect cause. Divorces granted to the wife for neglect to provide also show a high proportion in which intemperance was an indirect cause, about 1 out of 5.

In divorces granted to the husband intemperance is much less frequent as an indirect cause. The greatest relative frequency of intemperance as an indirect cause for the husband is found in divorces granted for cruelty, where it was present in about 1 case out of 10.

ILLICIT DISTILLING.

The attached letter and report are self-explanatory:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, June 27, 1917.

Hon. JACOB E. MEEKER, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. MEEKER: In compliance with the request contained in your letter of the 25th instant, in so far as the records of this office permit, I beg to inclose herewith a statement compiled therefrom, showing the number of illicit distilleries seized and destroyed, "State by State, for the years 1905 to 1916, inclusive."

This office is unable to state the number of persons arrested for illicit distilling during that period.

Very respectfully,

DAVID A. GATES,
Acting Commissioner.

MAIL-ORDER HOUSES, ILLICIT DISTILLERIES, AND BOOTLEGGERS.

I submit without comment the following:

On page 29 of his annual report for 1914, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, in speaking of illicit distilleries and bootleggers, reports as follows:

Illicit distilling during the past fiscal year increased slightly over the preceding year. Bootlegging is principally carried on in States operating under local prohibition laws and appears to be one of the hardest propositions that revenue officers are called upon to solve. This class of violators of the internal-revenue laws are at no time stationary, but move from place to place, offering and selling their illicit wares. It is impossible, owing to the limited number of revenue officers in the field, to break up this practice entirely, and without the hearty cooperation of the local and State authorities it is believed that the conditions will grow no better. As the various States vote "dry" the operations of the bootlegger grow larger.

On June 20, 1911, the Interstate Commerce Commission rendered an opinion "in the matter of the investigation and suspension of advances in rates by express companies for the transportation of liquor."

In commentiug upon the history and scope of the mail-order liquor business the commission finds as follows:

The industry directly concerned in this question is that of the mail-order liquor houses. The mail-order business in packages of liquor in this country had its beginning about a quarter of a century ago. At that time it was of small proportions, very few packages being shipped, and those only to short distances. It was the spread of the prohibition movement that gave vitality to this character of traffic in liquor. Local option at first drove the dealers from the localities where they had carried on a retail business to settle on the outskirts of the proscribed territory and ship liquor into it. As the prohibitive area spread the shippers were driven farther and farther back, but their business became more extended in the territory covered, and larger in the volume of the traffic. With State-wide prohibition came the interstate traffic in liquor. The decision of the Supreme Court that this traffic was interstate and therefore superior to interference by the State governments, gave the industry a tremendous impetus, and established the express companies as the carriers of practically the whole of this traffic.

The proportions of the business throughout the country at the present time can not be estimated with any degree of accuracy, but figures presented by the Southern Express Co. may be made the basis of a fair approximation. Jacksonville, Fla., probably the largest shipping point for liquor in the South, sends out between three and four thousand packages of one or two gallons daily, or a total of about 1,500,000 gallons a year Chattanooga ships about 786,000 gallons; Richmond, 546,720 gallons; Petersburg, 268,128; Pensacola, 267,760; New Orleans, 255,856; Augusta, 215,150; and Norfolk, Va. Cairo, Ill., Emporia, Va., Louisville, Ky., Portsmouth, Va., Roanoke, Va., and Savannah, Ga., ship more than 100,000 each annually. The total annual movement indicated is 6,085,264 gallons. When it is considered that these shipments are almost entirely from three or four States in the southern part of the country, and that the traffic itself is country-wide, it is not an extreme estimate that the entire volume of this traffic, going entirely to consumers and not to dealers, is in excess of 20,000,000 gallons a year.

These packages are sent, express charges paid, direct to the consumers on orders in most cases paid for in advance of shipment. The movement is much more active in the South than in other sections of the country, partly because of the extent of the prohibition territory in that section, partly because of the large quantities of very cheap whisky manufactured and shipped there for the consumption of the negro population. While it is not the function of this commission to be influenced in its conclusions by the moral aspect of the question, it is impossible not to recognize in this traffic one of the important factors in the race problem of the South—the evil spirit back of that problem in more ways than one. Generally speaking, the evidence presented at these hearings went to show a distinct cleavage in the industry. In the West a higher grade of liquor was shipped and a better clientele appealed to; in the South both whisky and consumers were on a considerably lower grade.

GRAND TOTAL OF DEALERS.

I insert here the reports on the grand totals of the different manufacturers and dealers and illicit distilleries seized from the years 1905 to 1916, inclusive.

The reader will note an apparent discrimination between the number of illicit distilleries reported here and in the grand totals as given in the report of illicit distilleries State by State. Reference to pages 151 and 152 of the Report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for 1915, or to pages 165 and 166 in the same report for 1916, will show that the higher numbers as given here is illicit distilleries reported for siezure, while the numbers given in the other report referred to, is of illicit distilleries actually seized.

The reports of the Internal Revenue Commissioner as to the number of persons arrested for illicit distilling from the years 1908 to 1916, inclusive, show the following:

1908	328
1909	470
1910	470
1911	529
1912	494
1913	459
1914	504
1915	893
1916	1,314
Total	4,663

I was unable to obtain the report for the fiscal year closing June 30, 1917, the department not having the report yet made up.

The following report from the Department of Internal Revenue gives the grand total of the several industries mentioned from 1905 to 1916, inclusive:

Report for the fiscal year 1917 is not yet available. However, there will be a marked increase of output over that of 1916. A peculiar feature of the matter is that while the number of producers has declined the volume of output has increased.

PATENT MEDICINES.

Below is a list of "patent medicines" which will be found on file in the Department of Internal Revenue. The total number here given is 746. The alcohol by volume to be found in these "medicines" should suggest to the thoughtful student that we as yet are not making much headway in the fight against alcoholism by constantly exempting alcohol for "medicinal purposes." Be it remembered that these "medicines" pay no Federal tax, while beers, wines, and liquors turn in hundreds of millions annually into the Treasury.

The reader will discover that in a number of instances the same "medicines" are shown to contain different percentages of alcohol. Just why these variations I do not venture to suggest. The reader must draw his own conclusions.

The Department of Commerce gives the total capitalization of patent and proprietary medicine concerns as $71,437,000.

These concerns are the special beneficiaries of prohibition legislation, and many of them are liberal supporters of the Anti-Saloon League.

I ask the reader if he, in all candor, believes that we are aiding the cause of temperance by striking down the pure beers, wines, and liquors and giving a free right of way to these concoctions, which are but combinations of alcohol, drugs, and dopes?

TREASURY DECISION 2222.

REVISED LIST OF ALCOHOLIC MEDICINAL PREPARATIONS FOR THE SALE OF WHICH SPECIAL TAX IS REQUIRED.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, D. C., June 25, 1915.

To collectors of internal revenue, revenue agents, and others:

The accompanying list of alcoholic medicinal preparations which have been examined by this office and held to be insufficiently medicated to render them unfit for use as a beverage is published for the information of all concerned.

Special tax will be required for the sale of any of the preparations herein named, even though such sales are for medicinal use. The liabilities of dealers for sales for medicinal use of any of the preparations marked with an asterisk (*) will, however, be held to date from and after August 1, 1915.

The names of most of the preparations heretofore given on the various lists which have been published will be found included in this list, the only exceptions being those the manufacturers of which have revised their formulas to meet the requirements of this office or which are no longer on the market.

Special tax should not, therefore, be required for the sale for medicinal use of any alleged medicinal compound not on this list until this office has been communicated with and specific instructions received.

The preceding paragraph does not, however, apply to the class of compounds usually described by the term "cocktail bitters," which are suitable for and usually used as beverages.

It having been found in various instances that there are several preparations of the same name on the market, the names of the manufacturers of the preparations examined by this office are here given, and it should be understood that only the preparations as compounded by the manufacturer whose name is given are embraced in this list.

Special tax will be required for the manufacture and sale of beef, wine, and iron, unless it contains at least the percentages of beef and iron given in the formula on page 1821 of the nineteenth edition of the United States Dispensatory or is otherwise sufficiently medicated to be unsuitable for use as a beverage. Special tax will also be required for the sale of compounds ordinarily sold under the name of rock, rye, and glycerin, and ginger brandy.

Collectors and revenue agents should continue to secure and forward to this office samples of preparations which they have reason to believe are or may be used as a beverage.

A number of the preparations appearing on the previous list have been omitted from the present list, for the reason that the manufacture thereof has been discontinued.

DISTILLERY BONDING, WAREHOUSE RECEIPTS, ETC.

The following from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may be of interest to those who would know of the methods of bonding distillers, Government handling of their goods, and the use of warehouse receipts as collateral in the business and banking world:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, June 14, 1917.

Hon. JACOB E. MEEKER,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. MEEKER: Replying to your several inquiries regarding bonded whiskies, you are informed:

1. That all whisky when produced must be gauged and at once deposited in the distillery bonded warehouse and must be covered by an annual or monthly warehousing bond to be given by the distiller, and conditioned for the payment of the tax on such spirits before removal from the warehouse and within eight years from the date of deposit.

2. The tax on such spirits is to be paid by stamp by the distiller, to be affixed to each package of spirits withdrawn by him.

3. This tax is to be paid before removal of the spirits and within eight years, as above stated.

4. That distillery warehouses are under the control of the collector of the district (3271 R. S.) and in the joint custody of the storekeeper and proprietor thereof. (Sec. 3274 R. S.)

5. Every distiller, before commencing business, and on the 1st day of May of each succeeding year, is required to give a bond conditioned for the faithful compliance with all provisions of law relating to the duties and business of distillers (sec. 3260 R. S.). This bond is in addition to the warehousing bonds referred to in paragraph 1.

6. Distillers' bonds may be signed either by individual sureties or by surety companies, and bonds so signed may be accepted by the collector of the district.

7. Ordinarily warehouse receipts for bonded spirits are issued by the distiller for five-barrel lots, in which receipts the spirits are described by serial numbers, number of wine and proof gallons, warehouse in which stored and date when deposited in warehouse.

As shown by the inclosed circular (Dept. No. 19) of April 27, 1909, no provision is made in the revenue law respecting warehouse receipts or certificates for bonded spirits. No regulations, therefore, have been provided respecting the issuing, registering, or canceling such receipts and I am unable to furnish any information on these points, except that, as understood by this office, these warehouse receipts or certificates are quite extensively used by distillers as collateral in obtaining loans from banks or from other sources.

Respectfully, W. H. OSBORN, Commissioner.

WAREHOUSE RECEIPTS OR CERTIFICATES FOR BONDED SPIRITS.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, April 27, 1909.

To collectors of internal revenue and others concerned:

The attention of this office has recently been called to certain so-called warehouse certificates for bonded whisky issued by companies not the distillers or warehousemen and purporting to be issued subject to the laws of the State and of the United States, and also purporting to be countersigned or verified by United States gaugers.

As no provision is made in the internal-revenue laws respecting warehouse receipts or certificates for bonded spirits, the signing of such receipts or certificates by gaugers, or the use of their names in connection therewith, is not only wholly unwarranted, but is calculated to deceive the purchaser of such bonded spirits. Collectors will therefore at once notify gaugers in their respective districts that in no instance are warehouse receipts or certificates, however issued, to be signed by them.

Gaugers and other internal-revenue officers are again reminded that no document or paper should be signed by them, in their official capacity, except such as are prescribed or authorized by law or by regulation of this office.

ROBT. WILLIAMS, JR.,
Acting Commissioner.

Approved:
FRANKLIN MACVEAGH,
Secretary of the Treasury.

WINES.

I submit herewith a letter, with statements attached, from Dr. George C. Hussman, pomologist, in charge of Agricultural Investigations, United States Department of Agriculture, Bureau of Plant Industry.

In addition to this letter and information, I insert a line taken from the Department of Commerce, which gives the total capitalization of the manufacturers of vinous liquors—$31,516,000.

The reader will readily understand the impossibility of giving the total valuations of the holdings of the different industries the capitalization of which is set out in this study. And, in addition, the reader will understand that to obtain the data as to the value of all affiliated industries, trades, and professions connected with or affected by the prohibition of the manufacture of beers, wines, or liquors is a task too stupendous for even the Government statisticians to undertake.

I would suggest that the reader prepare his own list of those who would be affected in some form or other by this ruthless destruction of the property and the rights of our citizens.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
BUREAU OF PLANT INDUSTRY,
Washington, D. C., June 12, 1917.

Hon. JACOB E. MEEKER,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. MEEKER: Inclosed please find question sheet left here today by messenger from your office, and replies to those questions relative to which the work of this office pertains.

I am also inclosing carbon copy of a table showing "Acreages and value of grapes used for raisin, table-grape, wine, and unfermented grape-juice purposes," which I thought might interest you.

Kindly let me know if at any time I can be of further service.

Very truly, yours,

GEO. C. HUSMANN,
Pomologist in Charge of Viticultural Investigations.

Acreage of grapes, 530,000 acres.
Acreage of wine grapes, 275,000 acres.
Where grown, in 46 States of United States.
Number of pounds, 2,750,000,000.
Vintage, 1,750,000,000 pounds.
Value, $40,000,000.
Percentage of crop used in wine industry, 70 per cent.
Amount of exports, $500,000; rasins 7,500,000 pounds.
Exported to European and South American countries.

ACREAGES AND VALUE OF GRAPES USED FOR RAISINS, TABLE GRAPES, WINE, AND UNFERMENTED GRAPE-JUICE PURPOSES.

Taking as a basis the last census figures of total acreages planted to vines, 283,914,000 vines bearing and nonbearing, all of which should now be in full bearing and should produce 3,339,380,000 pounds. produced in 1910 in round numbers 2,570,970,000 pounds. These should now be in full bearing and should produce 3,339,380,000 pounds.

The bearing acreage in raisin grapes is	109,000
The bearing acreage in table grapes is	50,000
The bearing acreage in wine and unfermented grape-juice grapes is	261,000
Total	420,000

VALUE OF ANNUAL PRODUCT.

Value of raisins grown at present is	$10,000,000
Value of wine and unfermented grape juice is	25,415,000
Value of table grapes is	6,073,200
Total	41,488,200

These figures are obtained by multiplying the number of pounds grown of the different kinds of grapes by what is thought to be the average price paid the grower for such grapes. There are not any figures published on unfermented juice. These are estimated and given with the grapes used for wine purposes.

As regards sweet wines, the great bulk of them are made in California, where until last year the annual output of recent years has been from sixteen to nineteen million gallons. The counties in which these are principally made are Fresno, San Joaquin, Merced, Kern, Sacramento, Placer, Yolo, Los Angeles, and San Bernardino Counties.

Dry wines are not only made where the sweet and sparkling wines are, but are the wines produced in such other parts of the country producing wines that do not make sweet and sparkling wines.

Excepting 1915, which was an exceedingly poor year so far as grape crop is concerned, the following figures are about what the average annual total wine production (this includes the unfermented grape juice) in the United States has been since 1910, as given in trade papers:

	Gallons.
Southern States	500,000
New Jersey	250,000
New York	2,500,000
Ohio	2,000,000
Western States	750,000
California	39,000,000
All other States	500,000
Total	45,500,000

It is our opinion, however, that had even the most conservative figures been taken it would increase the entire output from 20 to 30 per cent.

Of the figures given, 275,000 acres in bearing are credited to California. Of these, there are 130,000 acres devoted to wine grapes; 109,000 acres to raisin grapes; and 36,000 acres to table grapes. The income from grapes in that State is estimated at over $25,000,000. There is no adequate basis for estimates of the production by States and counties in this country of dry wines, champagnes, cordials, and compounds. Furthermore, prohibition measures passed by some of the States in recent years have changed their complexion so they should hardly be rated as formerly.

Under wine production of this country are implied all wines—dry, sweet, and sparkling.

The great bulk of the sweet and sparkling wine output is confined to but very few States and localities. New York State produces the great bulk of the sparkling wines (not carbonated) made in this country, and most of them are made in the Keuka Lake district, although some establishments are also to be found in other districts, as the Hudson district; in Ohio on the Lake Erie Islands, and in Erie and Cuyahoga Counties. In New Jersey in the Egg Harbor district; and in Virginia, at Norfolk limited quantites are made. In California there are three sparkling-wine establishments of importance—the Paul Masson Co., at San Jose; the Italian-Swiss Colony, at Asti; and Korbel Bros., at Guernsville.

Under sparkling wines are not included artificially charged wines.

BREWERIES.

The Secretary of the Department of Commerce reports that the total capitalization of the manufacturers of malt liquors is $792,914,000. This refers only to the capitalization. It does not set out the value of the holdings of the brewing industries in the way of real estate, machinery, and general equipment, nor does it cover the value of leaseholds, outstanding contracts for materials, and for labor. I have not as yet been able to obtain these figures. Even the beginning of an attempt to tabulate such appalls one with the stupendous sums involved.

BREWER'S GRAINS.

Dr. A. E. Taylor, of the Department of Agriculture, in discussing brewer's grains, says:

Brewer's grains. * * * When a unit of barley is converted into malt and the malt converted into beer, the dried residue, including grains and sprouts, corresponds to about 30 per cent of the weight of the barley, and contains about 85 per cent of the protein.

Between 270,000 and 300,000 tons are employed annually.

As a protein concentrate in ordinary good dairy practice 3 parts of such protein will yield 1 part of casein.

Brewer's grains are as good but no better than mill feed, cottonseed meal, or other dairy feed, protein for protein.

Distiller's grains yield about the same bulk but are more valuable, because they contain all of the protein; they have the same value as grain for beef cattle, protein for protein. The total amount is somewhat smaller than figures given for brewer's grains.

Exports. * * * According to the malsters, somewhere between seven and ten million bushels, the United Kingdom being the largest individual buyer.

Substitutes. * * * Mill feed, cottonseed meal, peanut meal, soy bean, velvet-bean meal are all successful dairy feeds, and properly used give the same result, protein for protein.

Milk. * * * Neither brewer's grains nor any other feed can increase milk production beyond their protein content. The malt sprouts share with green roughage a certain stimulation of milk production. This can be replaced by ensilage or alfalfa.

Is it an economical dairy feed? * * * Practically all of these feeds are sold on a basis of protein content, and price is a question of supply, transportation, etc.

Distiller's dried grains are sold to feed manufacturers who prepare mixed feeds.

MATERIALS USED.

The following from the Department of Agriculture will be of special interest in view of the fact that the head of the agricultural educational work of the State of Kansas gave out the statement some two months ago that 620,000,000 bushels were annually consumed in the manufacture of alcoholic beverages and that some of the leading "educators," "economists," "reformers," and "uplifters" picked up this statement and heralded it abroad in their efforts to stampede the country into the indorsement of prohibition.

The reader can draw his own conclusions as to such practices.

In addition to the statement from Dr. Taylor I wish to add a telegram from Mr. W. E. Skinner, secretary National Dairy Council, addressed to Hon. David F. Houston, Secretary of Agriculture, and also a quotation from Henry M. Morrison's Standards and Tables, 1915 edition, which is self-explanatory:

[Copy of telegram.]

MAY 10, 1917.

HON. DAVID F. HOUSTON,
Secretary of Agriculture, Washington, D. C.:

We are petitioned to take an active interest in the matter now up for consideration on the closing of distilleries and breweries and the effect thereby on the dairy-cow food supply. We are for the suppression of alcoholic liquor manufacture as a food-conservation measure without reservation if some other method can be brought into service to give the supply of feed—namely, brewers' and distillers' grains and malt sprouts—necessary not only to hold our milk supply to present figures but to increase it, and we are sure our national chemists can meet the need, but until such time as this can be accomplished we trust that the supply of feed, which is now abnormally expensive, be not jeopardized in quantity or quality. The actual feeding value of these feeds is proven to be relatively two and one-half times higher than any whole grain feeds on the market. We urge your most serious consideration of this matter.

W. E. SKINNER, Secretary.

PERSONS EMPLOYED.

I insert here a letter, with statement attached, from the Acting Commissioner of Labor Statistics, United States Department of Labor.

It will be noted that the commissioner reports only the number of persons engaged directly in the manufacture and sale of these products. He does not give the numbers of persons employed in the allied and dependent trades and industries, such as glass blowers, coopers, carpenters, manufacturers of brewery machinery and ice-making machinery, automobile and wagon manufacturers, miners, teamsters, printers, advertising concerns, real estate companies, bonding companies, malting companies, hop growers, and transportation companies. Nor does he nor can he list the enormous number of retail merchants who sell food, fuel, clothing, and all supplies to the men and women engaged in these varied industries:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF LABOR,
BUREAU OF LABOR STATISTICS,
Washington, June 9, 1917.

Hon. JACOB E. MEEKER, M. C.,
United States House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.
(Attention of Mrs. Redmon, Secretary)

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: In response to a verbal request from your secretary, Mrs. Redmon, this morning, I am sending you herewith a memorandum taken from the census, showing the number of persons engaged in the production of distilled, malt, and vinous liquors, also the number of saloon keepers and bartenders, as shown from the occupation statistics of the census.

In regard to wages in the brewing industry, I am inclosing the galley proofs of our report on union wages and hours of labor for 1916, so far as brewery workmen are concerned. We have no wages covering workers in distilleries nor in the production of wine.

Sincerely, yours,

ETHELBERT STEWART,
Acting Commissioner of Labor Statistics.

Memorandum.

The number of persons engaged in the manufacture of liquors in the United States in 1909, according to the Thirteenth Census, Manufactures, General Report and Analysis, Volume VIII, pages 532–3:

Distilled: Total, 8,328 persons, including 8,130 wage earners.
Malt: Total, 66,725 persons, including 54,135 wage earners.
Vinous: Total, 2,726 persons, including 2,454 wage earners.

Persons 10 years of age and over engaged in manufacture of liquors and beverages in 1910, according to the Thirteenth Census, Occupation Statistics, Volume IV, pages 354–356:

Breweries	69,696
Distilleries	11,076
Other liquor and beverage factories	20,983

Volume IV, above quoted, pages 430–432, shows the number of bar tenders in the United States as 101,234 and saloon keepers 68,215.

REVENUE.

The attached letter from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue gives the grand total of internal-revenue receipts from September 1, 1862, to June 30, 1916, inclusive. This amount is $6,434,327,214.07. The appended letter of June 11, 1917, from the Chief of Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, Department of Commerce, sets out the sums received on imported liquors, beers, and wines from 1866 to 1916, inclusive. The grand total is $491,713,936.

For the first 11 months of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, internal-revenue receipts have amounted to $256,868,802. I was unable to obtain the figures on the imports for the past year. However, adding together the sums already in hand by the Government, we find the grand total, excluding the import duties for the fiscal year just closed, to be $7,182,910,952.07.

It is expected that under the new revenue bill, soon to be passed, that the minimum revenue derived from these sources will be more than $400,000,000 annually.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, June 8, 1917.

Hon. JACOB E. MEEKER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. MEEKER: I have the honor, in reply to your letter of the 5th instant, to inform you that internal-revenue receipts from all forms of wine beer, and liquor taxes, including all special taxes relating to same, aggregated $6,434,327,214.07 during the period September 1, 1862, to June 30, 1916, as shown by the reports of the bureau. Internal-revenue receipts from all sources, which included income taxes, were $10,619,528,395.93.

Respectfully,

W. H. OSBORN, Commissioner.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
BUREAU OF FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC COMMERCE,
Washington, June 11, 1917.

Hon. JACOB E. MEEKER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: In compliance with your request of the 5th instant, addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury, I take pleasure in transmitting herewith a statement showing the total amount of duty collected on liquors imported into the United States during the fiscal years ending June 30, 1866, to 1916, inclusive. Prior to the establishment of the Bureau of Statistics in 1865 only the total annual customs revenue collected is shown, but not segregated as to amounts collected on the different imported commodities.

Very truly, yours,

E. E. PRATT, Chief of Bureau.

There is much more data which might and which should be added. We have not considered the question of the revenues now received by States and municipalities, the abolition of which would require an immediate increase of tax rates in such States and municipalities. We have not discussed the outstanding contracts of men in all the diversified lines of this industry. We have not touched upon the question of leaseholds, bank loans, bonds, and warehouse receipts which are up now as collateral for loans, labor contracts, present growing crops of grapes, hops, barley; the disposal of the 2,000,000 bushels of brewer's rice, which is only the screenings from edible rice; the substitution of raw grains for the brewer's dried grains for the feeding of cattle, and scores of kindred subjects.

The more deeply we go into a study of this whole problem the more plainly evident does it become that an attempt at its solution overnight by snap-judgment legislation is but the idle fancy of an uninformed mind.

But again I say that the doctrine of prohibition is viciously anti-American, unconstitutional, and contrary to the laws of civilized society. Its injectment into our legislative program at this time means the division of our Nation when we should all be united as never before.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for seven minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California [Mr. RANDALL] asks unanimous consent for seven minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, quite by accident I discovered in the RECORD this morning that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] while I was temporarily out of the House yesterday, made some criticisms about extensions of remarks in the RECORD.

On page 4436 he states that 29 poems, 54 editorials, 26 speeches made by others than Members of Congress, and so forth, have been recently printed in the RECORD, and he concludes his criticism with the statement that a number of telegrams were printed in the RECORD on the 20th day of June of this year. Now, it so happens that the telegrams were the extension of my remarks, and it strangely happens that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] never discovered any criticism that could be made of extensions of remarks until those telegrams were printed in the RECORD. Those telegrams were on the subject of prohibition, were all from men of nation-wide prominence, and all demanded the enactment of war-time prohibition.

On the 8th of March there was printed in the RECORD an extension of remarks of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER] against prohibition, comprising 67 pages, and this was printed in the RECORD four days after this House adjourned. But the gentleman from Massachusetts never found any fault with that.

I have no apology to make for the extension of these telegrams in the RECORD on the 20th day of this month. In every case they were signed by men who are widely known over this country, by six railroad presidents, by numbers of bank presidents, by 15 or 20 college presidents, and so forth. For instance, one of them was signed by Luther Burbank, the plant wizard; another by Booth Tarkington, novelist; another by Gen. Nelson A. Miles; another by Louis F. Post, Assistant Secretary of Labor; another by Chief Justice Reese, Nebraska Supreme Court; another by Amos Parker Wilder, former consul general at Shanghai; another by Frederick Palmer, war correspondent; another by Dr. Newman, president of Howard University of Washington; another by John D. Rockefeller, jr.; another by David R. Forgan, president of the National City Bank of Chicago; another by W. G. Beird, president of the Chicago & Alton Railroad, all favoring prohibition. These are only samples. There is no question about the authorship and great value of the remarks which were extended by me in the RECORD of the 20th of June. In all, there were more than 500 telegrams of similar tenor, all from leaders in business, science, education, and economics.

I return to the remarks which occupied 67 pages in the RECORD of March 8, four days after this House had adjourned, and about the authorship of which the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HELVERING] raised some question the other day. I think I have been fortunate enough to discover the real author of those remarks. I will ask to have read in my time the statement of the Kansas City Post of June 19, of this year.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

[From the Kansas City Post, June 19, 1917.]

That a speech delivered in Congress last March by JACOB MEEKER, formerly a Methodist minister and now a Congressman from St. Louis, in which MEEKER startled the country by attacking the national prohibition measure, was written for him at the order of the Kansas City Breweries Co. was claimed in a suit filed to-day in the circuit court here by Paul S. Conwell, who declares he was hired to write the speech by Conrad Mann, general manager of the breweries company, but never paid for his work.

Congressman MEEKER'S speech was one of the most powerful factors in killing for the time being the attempt to promote a Federal prohibition law. Because of his former connection with the church, his influence in religious affairs, and his supposed "neutrality" on the wet or dry question his arguments against national interference in the liquor problem were widely quoted, and made much of by the wets.

The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD printed the speech in full, and Congressmen who opposed the national prohibition measure distributed it at the Government's expense to all their constituents.

Conwell declares in his petition that he was hired early this year by Mr. Mann, who agreed to pay him $1,600 for writing the Meeker speech and some other incidental publicity work. Conwell says that after the speech was delivered and given Nation-wide prominence Mann paid him $200, and told him to look to other brewers for the balance of the $1,600 promised him.

Mr. Mann refused to discuss the suit.

Mr. BURNETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANDALL. Yes.

Mr. BURNETT. How could that powerful speech of Mr. MEEKER'S influence Congress when it was made four days after Congress adjourned?

Mr. RANDALL. I give it up. Now, Mr. Speaker, I agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts that the privilege of extending remarks in the RECORD ought not to be abused.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANDALL. I will.

Mr. KING. I have been one of the victims of the effect of the effort of the gentleman from Massachusetts to curtail the publication of speeches in the RECORD. Does the gentleman know of any order or decree recently issued constituting the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] to act as censor of the RECORD in this House?

Mr. RANDALL. I think that had better be answered from that side of the House.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday I obtained leave to address the House for one hour on next Tuesday. I might as well do it now, if I can get the consent of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to be permitted to address the House for one hour in lieu of the one hour on next Tuesday. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman from New York yield me two minutes?

Mr. LONDON. I will.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, at present I want to say that I can only find three falsehoods in this item which was read from the desk, presented by the gentleman from California. I have not had time to look it all over. I never was a Methodist preacher; I did not deliver the speech before the House; and the man referred to never wrote the speech.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, I intend to devote the hour to a discussion of the historical causes of the Russian revolution and its probable effect on the course of the world war.

A few days ago this Congress was thrilled by the presence and message of the envoys of the newest democracy.

Russia was a land of sorrow. She was also a land of mystery to the rest of the world. Except for an occasional glimpse of light that came outside of her boundaries through the works of her literary geniuses the world knew little about her. The revolution came as a complete surprise.

Our press was reticent about reporting the internal struggle within Russia ever since the beginning of the war. Unfamiliar with the historical causes which have led up to this welcome change, lovers of liberty everywhere hesitate to believe that the change is a permanent one and that democracy has come to stay.

The outside world seems to have assumed that the Russian people were in love with their chains. The noble struggle of her men and women, a struggle which continued for more than 60 years in the face of what appeared to be insuperable odds, was unknown outside of Russia. Before the emancipation of the serfs in 1861 a movement to liberalize the institutions of Russia along modern lines gained quite a foothold among the intellectual elements, many of whom had received a European education. A series of radical publications, defying the rigor of the censor, urged the adoption of the fundamental principles of civic liberty, such as equality of all before the law, separation of the judicial power from the administrative, responsibility of ministers, freedom of conscience and creed, freedom of the press.

Deprived of political life in the sense in which it is enjoyed in countries where democratic institutions have been established for any length of time, and hampered by an oppressive censorship, all expressions of discontent, all the fermentation of new ideas, and all the things which stirred the souls of the Russian found expression in Russia's literature. Where in other countries men debated political platforms or advocated or opposed candidates for office, political, social, economic, and philosophical tendencies found Russia's literature their principal vehicle of expression. Men would discuss the hero and the heroine of a novel or an article of literary criticism, analyzing a novel or the review of a book, with the same earnestness, and, so far as the educating of the people was concerned, with the same effect as men in democratic countries discussed political issues. The novelist, the writer of dramas, the satirist, the literary reviewer, were the real movers of the people's minds.

While the struggle for liberty antedates the emancipation of the serfs, it was in the sixties and after that great historical event and with the problems created by it, that the movement of liberation gained a new impetus. Industry and commerce were then comparatively undeveloped. The land was largely agricultural. Even now Russia, with a population of nearly 180,000,000 souls, has only 19 towns with a population over 100,000, and 3,000 towns with a population up to 10,000, while 521,754 villages have less than 100 population.

The improvement of the condition of the large agricultural masses, the securing to the peasants of elementary civic rights and of sufficient land allotments to earn a livelihood, the mitigation of the burdens imposed upon them by the very act of emancipation, the necessity of creating and maintaining political and economic institutions which would foster the normal development of the country, such were the main demands of the liberal elements of Russia.

The famous zemstvo institution, established in 1864, was to furnish the basis of self-government and help determine the economic relations of the peasant to the adjoining private landowner as well as their relations to the Government. I may as well at this moment say a word about that distinctive Russian institution, the village or communal ownership of land. The land allotted to the peasants was not distributed among the individual peasants but to the collectivity, the village community, so that the principle of the collective right of the toilers of the soil to the benefit of their toil is a well-established principle in the life of the Russian agricultural masses. The attempt in 1906 to do away with the principle of collective ownership by permitting the land to be sold by the village to the head of the family has not been successful, very few peasants having taken advantage of the new law.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. May I ask the gentleman a question for information? The gentleman speaks of the village group. What relation has that to the zemstvo?

Mr. LONDON. The zemstvo is a provincial or district assembly, established a few years after the emancipation of the serfs. It was intended that the zemstvos should enjoy a substantial measure of local self-government, the delegates to the zemstvos consisting of representatives of the private landowners, of the village communities, and of the townspeople who possessed land.

The powers and the rights of the zemstvos were, however, considerably reduced in the ensuing reaction. The contest of the zemstvos for freedom from government interference forms one of the most interesting chapters of modern history. The zemstvo succeeded in retaining a semblance of self-government.

The movement of liberation was at that time confined almost exclusively to the nobility and to the so-called intellectual classes. So far as the great masses of the people were concerned, education was almost nonexistent. The men who craved for a change found themselves between the upper millstone of an arbitrary government, that hurried to retrace every forward step by taking more than one step backward, and the nether millstone of a densely ignorant mass.

Between an oppressive Government on top and the ignorant masses at the bottom the life of the Russian intellectual was alternating between spasms of revolutionary activity and dark despondency.

The so-called nihilist movement, a movement now extinct, was really not a political movement. It was a contest between the individual and the oppression of society. It was the self-assertion of the individual against accumulated prejudices, against suffocating conventionalities, against all rule of man by man. The nihilist placed his main reliance in the spread of knowledge of the physical sciences. The movement was not of a constructive character. Still it performed a great historical mission by arousing the spirit of aggressive rebellion in an age which threatened to stifle all higher aspirations by oppression from above and by inertia from below.

The purely negative philosophy of the nihilist could not hold out any promise of immediate improvement. The nihilist movement soon gave way to a militant demand for immediate and thoroughgoing political reforms through an assault upon autocracy. Notwithstanding the fact that some of these early advocates of a radical change were anarchists, who believed that as long as the State existed no measure of freedom could be obtained, and that the first duty of a free people was to do away with the State, life compelled them, contrary to their theories, to take an active part, and an aggressive part at that, in the effort to liberalize the form of government.

Meantime the Government never stopped its persecutions. Publications were suspended. The censorship kept on prohibiting the circulation of any literature in any way inimical to the policies of the Government. No book could appear without the previous approval of the censor.

It was then that the revolutionists determined to go to the masses. The movement assumed an idyllic and naive character. Men and women of the nobility would disguise themselves, and, assuming the garb of the peasants, undertook, by occupying modest positions as teachers, village secretaries, midwives, nurses, to come in contact with the people so as to uplift them and prepare them for the acceptance of modern ideas.

The slogan "Land and freedom" became the slogan of these apostles of liberty.

The Government redoubled its ruthlessness. In 1877, 193 representatives of that movement were placed on trial. It appears from a memorandum of the chief prosecutor that during three months 770 persons were placed under arrest, and among them 158 women.

The participation of woman in the revolutionary movement of Russia is the brightest page in the story of her martyrdom. Whether among the nihilists, the social democrats, the bund, the socialist revolutionists, the constitutional democrats, in every movement of rebellion the Russian woman took a leading part.

The Government's attempt to suppress this rather peaceable agitation drove the movement of education into a political movement of a terroristic character. A series of attempts upon the life of Czar Alexander II culminated in his assassination, with the inevitable result of a still more intolerable reaction which continued almost supreme until the revolution of 1905. Between the year 1881, when Alexander II was "removed" by the act of the terrorists, and 1905, when the Duma was established, a new power grew up in Russia. That was the industrial working class.

The growth of industry and commerce and the failure to allot sufficient land to the peasants, created quite a formidable industrial proletariat. A fertile field was created for the dissemination of the same social democratic ideals which inspired the working class of the rest of Europe. Here was a class historically destined for revolutionary thought and revolutionary action.

In 1898 a social democratic congress was held in Russia, of course a secret conference. About the same time the Jewish "Bund," a revolutionary socialist democratic organization which confined its activities to the Jewish population, gained a strong foothold. It is interesting to know that the "Bund" was the first organization to realize the importance of carrying revolutionary ideas into the army by forming a special military propaganda committee.

The Government found it impossible to crush the revolutionary movement. When apparently suppressed it continued as an underground movement. The movement ran along two parallel lines, that of the social democrats with the demand for the establishment of political and industrial democracy, revolutionary so far as the desire to overthrow autocracy was concerned, pinning its faith in education of the masses, and the movement of the socialist revolutionists, who took it for granted that the existence of the principle of collective ownership of land in the life of the Russian peasants created for Russia a problem distinctly its own and requiring methods entirely different from those practiced by the socialist movement in other countries. They practically adopted the old slogan of "Land and liberty" as their slogan. They demanded the abolition of autocracy and the collective ownership of land.

The socialist revolutionists also differed as to their methods of propaganda. They determined to strike the Government at its head, and replied to every act of repression on the part of the Government with an act of terrorism on their part. They carried on a systematic campaign of assassination against the administrative branch of the Government.

Nor should we overlook the work of the zemstvos. In spite of difficulties, hampered at every step by local officials and by the governors of the Provinces who were to check their activities, they persisted in improving the condition of the peasant. In some sections of Russia they succeeded in establishing a school within 2 miles of every home and a hospital within 5 miles of every home. They spread knowledge of agriculture and of sanitation. They undertook the education of the adult.

Their example was followed by the city dumas, the municipal authorities of the cities, who had also very limited powers and were also always subject to supervision from above by the administration. Numerous congresses began to take place during that period to discuss the needs of the Provinces. While officially confined to purely local and agricultural questions, the bigger problems of civil rights, freedom of the press, popular education, the limitations imposed upon the zemstvos, financial policies, the reactionary methods of the Government would now and then be taken up.

The Government continued its medieval policy. The administration subordinated the judiciary. Men were deprived of their liberty by administrative process. The governors of the Provinces appointed by the Czar were really the supreme power within each Province. The jails were filled with political prisoners.

The Government was not content with the mere checking of the activities of the people. It began a systematic campaign of terrorism and of oppression. Particularly heavy fell the hand of the Government upon all the creeds which did not belong to the Greek Catholic Church and upon the non-Slav population, the Poles, the Armenians, the Finns, and the Jews. All the terrors of the Inquisition were let loose upon the helpless Jewish people.

The Russian Jews had contrived, in spite of the limitations of their civic rights, to maintain a civilization of their own. Illiteracy was comparatively unknown among them, particularly among their men, as it was the religious duty of every Jew to be able to read his prayers, and the man who knew how to read prayers learned in the course of time to read revolutionary literature.

The Government realized the revolutionary character of the activity of the Jews and it began to organize massacres in order to crush them. The procurator of the synod is charged with having predicted as the result of this policy toward the Jews that a third of them would be converted, a third would emigrate, while the rest would die of hunger. The Government made a desperate effort to drown the revolution in Jewish blood.

The Government proclaimed as its policy orthodoxy, autocracy, nationality (Slavism). Nothing was to stand in the way.

It was during this period of fermentation that the imperialistic policy of expansion in the Far East and the purely sordid interests of a small clique surrounding the Czar brought about the disastrous Russo-Japanese War. The humilitation of the defeat of the giant Russia by a people one-fourth its size was so great that the incompetence, unfitness, and dishonesty of the Government became apparent to the great masses. The elements of discontent raised their heads. National congresses and conferences of groups and professions began to multiply. A great section of the nobility, many of them of a liberal turn of mind, joined in the general outcry for a change. A number of revolutionary newspapers, including a paper by the Constitutional Democrats, who at that time sought to establish a constitutional monarchy, found their way among the people. Most of these papers were published abroad and were smuggled into Russia. The Social Democrats, the Socialist Revolutionists, the "Bund," the Constitutional Democrats became more and more active. Their literature penetrated the masses. A series of strikes, small and big, broke out. Clashes with the Government multiplied. A revolution seemed inevitable, and on August 6, 1905, the Czar proclaimed an order convoking what he thought would be a national assembly with consultative powers.

This concession of the Government but poured oil upon the fire. The greatest general strike known to history paralyzed all civic activity. Everybody suspended work. The bricklayer, the telegrapher, the village teacher, the university professor, all were on strike. Less than 10 weeks later the Czar was compelled to confer legislative powers upon the national assembly. The new decree proclaimed the freedom of conscience, of speech, and of assembly. No law was to go into effect without the approval of the Duma or national parliament, and the council of the empire.

It was not that the Government had learned anything. As was proven by subsequent events, autocracy yielded for the moment firmly determined to regain its full strength at the first sign of weakening on the part of the revolutionary forces.

The call for the first Duma was so unsatisfactory to the radical elements that two of the radical parties officially boycotted the Duma and refused to participate in the election of representatives. Nevertheless, the first Duma, to the great consternation of the Czar, turned out to be most radical. Its very first act was a demand for the complete amnesty of all political prisoners. Indeed, it would have been grotesque had the Duma failed in this hour of the people's triumph to demand the immediate release of the champions of the people's rights.

The first Duma lasted from May 10, 1906, to July 9, 1906. The Government did not have much more luck with the second one. Nearly 200 Social-Democrats and Socialist Revolutionists were among the representatives in the second Duma, and the liberal elements outside of the industrial and agricultural working masses also sent the very ablest champions of popular liberties.

Autocracy and a parliament of this sort could not exist side by side. The second Duma lasted three months, from March 5, 1907, to June 3, 1907. The most remarkable thing about the second Duma was the large number of revolutionary representatives elected by the peasantry. It looked as if they had sent to the Duma, from which they expected both land and liberty, the men who had come in contact with them as their teachers, educators, and coworkers.

Then, as now, a workmen's council was organized, the workers trying by means of the strike to make the demands of the Duma upon the Government more effective. The first and successful gigantic general strike was followed by several other strikes less successful. Unfortunately, the workmen's council was not a soldiers' and workmen's council, as it is now. The rebellious masses were not armed.

As soon as the Government noticed the weakening of the workmen's council it was emboldened enough to disband the second Duma, and so to change the electoral law that the large agricultural and industrial working masses were practically denied all representation.

In the ensuing elections the Government used all of its oppressive powers to prevent the election not only of revolutionists, but of any man who was guilty of harboring a progressive idea. The success of the Government was almost complete. Both the third and the fourth dumas were overwhelmingly conservative and reactionary, the social democrats and the laborites having succeeded in electing only 25 representatives in the Fourth Duma, and the number of constitutional democrats was reduced to one-third of their former strength.

The men determined to promote democratic ideals found themselves surrounded in the national assembly itself by a majority of ardent supporters of the old régime. In spite of all, though, the Duma became the reservoir toward which all grievances of the country flowed. The liberal elements determined to save the existence of at least a semblance of a parliament in the hope that the gathering strength of the ever-growing democratic forces would make of the Duma a real parliament.

It became their policy to win against autocracy "by siege and not by assault." They submitted to humiliation in order to save the Duma. They were waiting and were working while waiting. The Government again commenced a series of repressive measures and persecutions, in the old style of pre-revolutionary days.

Again the smaller nationalities were subjected to indescribable persecutions. A state of despondency temporarily seized the minds of the people. The Government went to the extent of encouraging pornographic literature so as to destroy the morality of the students, who were always among the best revolutionary elements of Russia. More than 50 years before that the universities became the centers of revolutionary activity, women having fought out the right to attend the universities way back in the sixties.

The number of suicides multiplied, particularly among the young men. An attempt was made by the third and fourth Dumas to bribe the peasantry into loyalty to the Government by reducing some of their burdens. A vain effort was made to change the fundamental agricultural law applicable to land ownership by permitting lands to be acquired in perpetuity by the heads of families. Still it was impossible to believe that the people who had organized the most gigantic political strike in history and who had wrested from the worst of autocrats a popular assembly should not resume their efforts for liberty. It was impossible to believe that they had been crushed forever.

Even the reactionary Duma ultimately became the undoing of the Czar. Autocracy can not afford even to be praised. While the voices of protest in the Duma were few, there were some voices. The people looked to somebody other than the Czar for the redress of their grievances. No matter how hard the Government tried, it was impossible to restore that restriction of freedom of speech which existed before 1905.

Driven from direct participation in the political contest for representation in the Duma, the intrepid radicals directed their energies into the economic organizations of the working people, into the zemstvos, into the peasants' organizations, into cooperative societies, various cultural clubs, and educational organizations. The growth of cooperative societies and unions in Russia was phenomenal. From 4,479 in 1905 the cooperative societies grew to 37,000 in 1906, and the year before the outbreak of the war a national congress of cooperative societies was held with 1,300 delegates. Every union, every conference of cooperative societies, every dramatic club, every literary society, every gathering of the zemstvos, even congresses of medical societies and engineers' conventions, were utilized by the rebels, who would not and could not yield, to urge a change. Strikes increased both in number and in intensity.

By the beginning of 1914 and a short time before the outbreak of the war Russia was on the eve of another revolution. Then came the war.

While in the Russo-Japanese War the Government prohibited the zemstvos from active participation even in the furnishing of relief, the gigantic sacrifices required by this world conflict compelled the Government to call upon and to enlist the efforts of the entire people. While before the war every meeting and every assembly and every organization was looked upon with suspicion, the Government was forced to encourage cooperation among civic bodies, so that a complete network of national organizations, meeting for common purposes, coordinating their energies in one direction, was established throughout the country. The incompetence, the dishonesty, the unfitness, and the inability of the Government to wage a war for life and death with the best-organized military power in the world, led by brilliant generals and consisting of intelligent soldiers, the disasters which followed the brave efforts of an army sent to the front without ammunition, the sacrificing of thousands and hundreds of thousands of men who were sent with bare hands to attack entrenchments, barb-wire entanglements, and modern destructive artillery, the inability to provide the people with food, brought down the curses of an organized people upon the Government.

The chasm between the people and the Government grew wider. The contrast between the professions of an autocratic government talking about a war of liberation of nations, while its own people were being deprived of elementary rights, while its own members of the Duma were being sent to jail—five members of the social-democratic group were torn away from the Duma and exiled—while every non-Slav nationality within the domain of Russia was being crushed, was too real, too dangerous to be permitted to continue.

The reactionary elements saw the danger. They saw that a continuance of the war meant constant concessions to the people at the expense of autocracy. More than a year and a half ago it was brought out on the floor of the Duma that a large number of reactionary representatives were in a league to make a separate peace with Germany, no matter on what terms. It was brought out during the discussions that the Czar and Emperor Wilhelm were always a prop to each other. History fails to record a nobler or braver fight for democratic ideals than that waged during the last few years on the floor of the Duma by the revolutionary elements of Russia. Thus Prof. Miliukoff said when he protested against the persecution of the Armenians and the Jews:

> There is a certain level below which a nation can not descend without losing the right of sisterhood among civilized nations, and Russia has reached that level.
> We have reached the stage—

Said Tcheidse, a socialist deputy and now the president of the Soldiers' and Workmen's Council, a short time before this revolution—

> when the people must realize—and we are now realizing—that the Government and the people are not only two separate and distinct things but two entirely irreconcilable things. We have nothing in common with the Government, not even victory or defeat.

Who has ever heard braver words on the floor of any parliament?

Kerensky, the present war minister, again and again insisted that there was no hope for the people except in a complete change of the Government.

The leading newspapers carried stenographic reports of the speeches.

The members of the Russian Duma are elected for five years. The last Duma was elected in 1912. Political partisanship has not reached the hardened stage so characteristic of countries where political institutions are old. The exigencies of the war, the needs of the hour, the pressure of progressive elements, the alliance with democratic countries, the very proclamation of new ideals, the urging that came from the bottom up from the masses of the people, all these things resulted in the creation of an anti-Government coalition in the Duma itself.

The contest between autocracy and the representatives of the people reached the culminating stage. The storm was gathering. A shortage of food in the capital supplied the occasion for the outbreak.

I will not indulge in a description of the dramatic incidents of the revolution. It is still in the making and in the process of completion.

Under the superstructure of autocracy there grew up a complete network of national organizations. When it became necessary to create a new temporary government, there was the Duma, the people's assembly, to organize a provisional government. There was the national congress of zemstvos, whose president was asked to become the prime minister. There were the organized labor elements. There was the peasantry, with its simple and honest demands. There was the enthusiasm, the will, the statesmanship born of 12 years of parliamentary struggle.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. COX. In the election of these three Dumas that the gentleman has mentioned did the people have the right of a secret ballot, as we have in this country?

Mr. LONDON. The demand for secret, direct, and universal suffrage was one of the demands of the first and second Dumas, and was one of the reasons why they were disbanded by the Government.

Mr. COX. Do they have a secret ballot to-day? Or did they have before the present revolution?

Mr. LONDON. No; they have not.

Mr. COX. I know that in some European countries the ballot is viva voce. It is not a ballot at all.

Mr. LONDON. It is neither secret, direct, nor universal. The system used in the election of the last two Dumas particularly was a most indirect system.

Mr. COX. Had the landowners any interest?

Mr. LONDON. A controlling interest. The Government succeeded in so manipulating the electoral system that the third and the fourth Dumas had reactionary majorities, and the representatives of the laboring classes and the peasants found themselves in a very small minority. The latter had only about 25 representatives where they had before over 200. The demand for universal, secret, direct, and equal suffrage has been one of the demands up to the last moment. The third Duma expired in 1912; the present Duma is the fourth.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. Does the gentleman think this new revolution has a sufficient organization to hold together?

Mr. LONDON. It has. The revolution of 1917 is really a continuation of the revolution of 1905, except that the people are now armed. The present upheaval would have been entirely impossible without the gain of a national assembly and without the further gain of freedom of the press, which are directly due to the uprising of 1905.

Mr. HARDY. Have they now any cohesive organization?

Mr. LONDON. The spirit of cooperation among the various elements in this difficult period of transition fills one with astonishment. The peasantry, the industrial workers, the professional classes, the liberal elements of all classes, the army, all seem to have rallied to the defense of the provisional government.

The few reactionary elements have learned that it is unsafe to resist the irresistible and irrepressible drive of democracy. The present soldiers' and workmen's council tries to avoid the mistakes made in 1905. As soon as they had disbanded in 1906 the promises made to the people were withdrawn and the old Government was again in the saddle. The council representing the armed citizenry of Russia is the guardian of the newly acquired liberties, and it will probably continue until the constituent assembly is formed.

Now, I want to speak of the effect of the revolution on the progress of the war. A free people, once realizing that they are free, want to know what they are fighting for. That is self-evident. It stands to reason that a people who have overthrown their Government and have repudiated the internal policies of that Government, should, when requested to continue its foreign policy, ask for an opportunity to revise that foreign policy, for an opportunity to find out where the foreign policy is leading and that is exactly what has happened.

They began to examine what that foreign policy was, in the making of which they had had no part. They began to ask for the democratization of foreign relations, and you know that young democracies are honest and are not diplomatic. A young democracy loves liberty with a pure love. You will find in the oratory of the first 15 or 20 years of the history of this country the breath of pure democracy.

The new Government demanded a reexamination of treaties and tried to find out what the world was fighting for. The new Russia announced that so far as she was concerned, she wanted no indemnities, no conquests, no oppression of any people no matter however small. She wanted her allies to proclaim the same principles. For some inexplicable reason the American press interpreted this proclamation as a demand for a separate peace—as a desire to surrender to Germany. The slogan "No annexation" necessarily involves the restoration of Belgium to herself, the return to Serbia of her territory, the return of Montenegrin territory to Montenegro, the reestablishment of Roumania.

It necessarily implies the throwing of all possible safeguards around every other little nation in Europe. In protesting against punitive indemnities she but insisted that all warring nations should agree on a settlement of the war which should not crush any of the vanquished nations, which should not impose upon the conquered nations a burden which they would be unable to carry. Their basis for universal peace was entirely in harmony with the principles which the President enunciated in his speeches before the Senate, and especially in the speech of January 22 of this year. Russia proceeded to prove her good faith by waiving all claims upon Constantinople, reserving, of course, the right to insist upon the neutralization of the Dardanelles and by granting the highest degree of autonomy to Finland. It could not have been otherwise with the Socialists playing the part they do in the new Government. The right of every nation to live its own life is a cardinal part of the faith of international socialism. Where the same territory is occupied by several distinct nationalities, the Socialist would give to every such nationality the largest possible measure of cultural autonomy, and where more than one nation claims the right to a particular territory by reason of national affinity, he would let the local population determine its affiliations by a vote of freemen and not by external pressure.

The Encyclopædia Britannica, in its article on socialism, says that the ethics of Christianity and the ethics of Socialism are identical.

The belief in the oneness of the human family is the fundamental tenet of the socialist faith. More than 50 years ago the socialists established an international association, consisting of delegates from all the nations of the world, small and great. At stated periods they would come together in international congresses. In 1886 they established an international holiday—an international holy day—a sacred day, the 1st of May, which socialists through all the world were asked to celebrate, so as to emphasize on that day the universality and oneness of the human family, the fact that there should be no hatred between one nation and another, and that there should be no conflict between one people and another. The congresses took up the problems of wars of colonization, wars of imperial expansion, and sought a remedy for them. The latest congress was to have been held in the city of Paris, beginning on the 8th of August, 1914, and at that congress they were to have taken up the question whether a general strike was the proper remedy to prevent a war. The French had a number of able advocates of that idea. The demand of the socialists of Russia and of its new government, and of the soldiers' and workmen's council for a settlement of the war on a basis which would secure universal peace, without annexation, without punitive indemnities, on a basis which would insure to every nation the right to unchecked development, was in harmony with the fundamental principles of international socialism; and I was astonished when I read in the President's Flag Day speech, one of the ablest speeches that he has delivered, the statement that the Kaiser has been using for his purposes all elements, including the socialist and labor elements. Now, it so happens that the socialists have been the most consistent and the most courageous opponents of militarism and of all militaristic schemes. It so happens that the socialists of Germany were issuing every year statistical records of the number of hundreds of years of imprisonment meted out to the social democrats for fighting the Kaiser and for fighting militarism. It so happens that the only men in Germany to-day who are suffering imprisonment for fighting the Kaiser are socialists.

It so happens that it was the Socialist Haase who, addressing himself to the suggestion of a separate peace with Germany, said in the Reichstag on the 15th of April, 1917:

> Our Government must not delude itself with the hope that it can conclude a separate peace with Russia so as to throw all its forces against the other countries. The dream of a separate peace with Russia must once for all be abandoned. Nor should the Government deceive itself in the belief that by manipulation for a separate peace it will succeed in creating friction among the Russian socialists. This attempt will but more firmly unite the socialists.

Where and when have braver words of defiance ever been heard?

Mr. AUSTIN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. AUSTIN. How does the gentleman explain the inaction of the socialists in Germany in not rising up against their own unsatisfactory Government, when the socialists of Russia have done that?

Mr. LONDON. I will explain that, and that is something that should be understood. I expect a great change in Germany, and I expect a change throughout every country in the world. Gentlemen, in another 10 or 15 years we will see a great change in the world everywhere. Five or six years from now the gentleman will find himself voting for socialist measures.

He votes for some of them now, although at present he generally votes only for appropriations and not for measures of taxation, but he will have to change that.

Mr. AUSTIN. The gentleman from New York would not vote for the proposition to issue bonds to raise the necessary money to prosecute this war.

Mr. LONDON. That is all right. Now, let me answer the gentleman's question without bitterness. There is going to be a change in Germany. What has taken place in Germany is this: Under an oppressive political form the German people have managed to develop a high degree of education, so that there are no illiterates among them, and they have managed to obtain a large measure of economic improvement, while in some countries, which theoretically have democratic forms of government, the people have permitted an industrial oligarchy to sap the vital forces of democracy. Besides that, while I have not given any special thought to this theory, the theory is taking shape in my mind that a thoroughly educated people do not organize violent revolutions, because the more educated a people are the more will they rely upon the evolutionary process of obtaining their ends. That is why I am a social democrat, believing in education. I have not even given up the hope of educating the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN].

Mr. AUSTIN. The gentleman will have to live as long as Methuselah did to educate me along his lines of government—socialism.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, while the change is coming you must not forget that in every country of the world the socialists were confronted when war broke out with this situation: They were told everywhere that they were not patriotis. When they talked about internationalism or universal peace or demanded that the people have a voice in determining international relations, they were told everywhere that that was not the business of the people; they were told that somebody on top would tell them when wars should begin and when wars should end.

Is not that true? That condition confronted them everywhere, and they were nowhere numerically strong enough to resist. Assume that the socialists in this country should come out to-day and say——

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. And is it not a fact also that the press and all the powers of publicity were used to persuade them that they were being attacked?

Mr. LONDON. There is not the slightest doubt about that. When the question came up in the German Reichstag they were confronted with an existing state of war. They were told that the Cossacks had invaded German territory.

Mr. HARDY. And that the French had?

Mr. LONDON. And that the French had—that French aviators had crossed the border. Everywhere the people on top were strong enough to suppress the socialist protest against the war. Suppose in this country to-day that the six or seven hundred thousand socialists were, right or wrong, to take a stand with their 40 or 50 little weekly papers against the war, how long would it be before their leaders would be in jail? They are already arresting some of them because some little petty official believes they are careless in the use of language. That has been the fate of the socialist movement everywhere.

Mr. AUSTIN. Does not the gentleman approve of the arrests made recently in New York of Emma Goldman and Alexander Berckmann?

Mr. LONDON. I do not know what the gentleman is referring to, but I have advised and I do advise obedience to the law, for this reason: I have to be consistent; and, to my mind, if international war is a misfortune, civil war in a republic is a calamity. A republic can not last unless its laws are obeyed, and the people have to obey the law. [Applause.] If the law is oppressive, they have the privilege of changing it.

Mr. AUSTIN. Then what arrests was the gentleman condemning?

Mr. LONDON. Oh, I am speaking of arrests of a number of people throughout the country by petty officials who believe that the men arrested are too freely criticizing the Government or are using careless language and all that. It is a horrible thing to have some official become suddenly the regulator of the liberties of the people and the censor of speech and of the press.

Mr. AUSTIN. Can the gentleman name a single instance?

Mr. LONDON. I will get together some of these cases. I hoped there would not be any, but there are these cases. Of course, each case will have to be defended on its own merits. I speak of the possibility of this oppression, and I am very much alarmed at the danger of it.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Is not Liebknecht in prison now in Germany?

Mr. LONDON. Yes; and Rosa Luxenbourg has been imprisoned also—one of the leading socialists.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I wanted to ask the gentleman, for information, this question: Do modern German socialists adhere to the fundamental principles of Karl Marx now? I ask that in all fairness.

Mr. LONDON. I know the gentleman asks in good faith. I do not believe I should undertake to answer the question in the limited time at my disposal. One of the rules of elucidation is to compare things that people do not know with things that they do know something about, and I take it for granted that most of the Members of this House are altogether unfamiliar with the teachings of Karl Marx. I want to say this about the German social democracy: At the outbreak of the war they had a caucus rule which compelled all of the members of the social democracy to vote as a unit. There were 36 members in the Reichstag who were inclined from the very beginning to vote against the war budget. The socialist method of protesting against war budgets is to either vote "no" or walk out of the chamber while the vote is being taken; that is, where there are many of them, or to abstain from voting. There were 36 of them who wanted that the party should vote "no" on the war budget. About a year ago they all began to vote against further appropriations for the war.

They all protested against the deportation of the Belgian workers. Coming to the socialists of other countries, in the Austrian Reichsrath the socialists have recently insisted on universal peace. In the Italian Parliament the socialists have from the beginning of the war up to the present moment been against this war, because they have looked upon the Italian war as a war of conquest and for the acquisition of territory. They are ready in every country to stand for a war of defense. In Russia the socialists refused to participate in the debate and in the vote. So throughout the world they have been consistent, as consistent as life permitted them to be. Dreamer as he is, idealist as he is, when he is confronted with a fact he is compelled to recognize the fact. We can not, however, abandon our faith, we can not abandon our desire to fight for the highest measure of democracy in times of peace as well as in times of war. We demand freedom of speech, freedom of the press, and we demand that in time of war especially should we be permitted to discuss international relations. You can not have a war of a free people unless the people are for war. They have to be convinced; they have to be reasoned with; they have to be argued with, and there is no danger in permitting people openly to express their dissent. There is a great danger in driving people into the dark cellar of conspiracy, to have men whisper the things that the people have a right to hear openly.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. LONDON. I will.

Mr. HAMLIN. Under what circumstances would the gentleman be willing to fight?

Mr. LONDON. Would I be willing to fight?

Mr. HAMLIN. The gentleman's party.

Mr. LONDON. Is that question addressed to me individually or does the gentleman mean the party?

Mr. HAMLIN. To the party; yes; of course.

Mr. LONDON. The Socialist Party recognizes the right of a nation and the duty of a nation to defend itself against attack. That is not the question before us to-day. The question before us to-day is not whether you are willing to fight or not. The socialist, as every other citizen of this country, is confronted with an existing state of war. It is his obligation to teach the people obedience to the law first; second, to teach that every law that would lead to the defeat of the liberties of the people should be abrogated; third, it is his obligation to demand universal peace; that the principles upon which it may be established should be made clear to the world, so that all the liberty-loving elements of the world will understand that if they do fight that they are fighting freely, and that they are not being led to the shambles. [Applause.] That is what the socialists ask.

Mr. HAMLIN. Then, if that is the gentleman's idea, which is a very beautiful one, his party ought to go into this war with a great deal of enthusiasm, because we are certainly——

Mr. LONDON. In order to develop enthusiasm, you must first of all give people a chance to disagree with you. Freedom of speech does not mean the freedom of a fellow to speak things with which you agree. That is the way some people understand it. Now, they would not have us criticize or discuss international relations. Some great man, some leader, is supposed to do that for us. That is the monarchical idea. I deny that God has selected out of the human stock a few individuals and put into them so much wisdom that they can be trusted to guide the destinies of 100,000,000 people without asking for the cooperation of the people. [Applause.]

Mr. LOBECK. Will the gentleman state what is the real cause of the war?

Mr. LONDON. Is it my obligation to agree with the gentleman or may I express my mind freely? [Laughter.]

Mr. LOBECK. I would like to know.

Mr. LONDON. The historical causes of this war are, first, the conflict of economic interests between the various powers of Europe; second, the presence of large armaments and militaristic groups; third, munition makers, who are interested in keeping alive national hatreds; fourth, national hatreds and race prejudices; fifth, the inherited crimes of the past, the oppression of small nationalities, who, in striving for breathing space, came in conflict with the bigger nations.

These are probably the five principal causes. No nation is entirely free from blame, and while, chronologically speaking, the act of Austria-Hungary in attacking Serbia may be taken as the immediate cause, historically speaking, if you go back a few decades, you will trace it to the causes I have pointed out.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LONDON. I will.

Mr. HARDY. Does not the gentleman think also that the militaristic theories of the German autocracy had a great deal to do with it?

Mr. LONDON. A great deal. And it is extremely interesting in connection with the point the gentleman has brought out that the great Russian and German historians were developing the same idea in apologizing for their respective nations. The Russian historians argued that western Europe was under a profound obligation to Russia because by maintaining a large army and by sacrificing the rights of her own people she protected western civilization against the invasion of the Tartars. Now the German historians, in apologizing for the maintenance of a powerful military establishment, explained that the rest of western Europe was under obligations to Germany because the German military establishment was calculated to protect Germany and western Europe against the aggressions of the Russian barbarians. Revolutionary France, when reproached for her unholy and unnatural alliance with the Czar, pleaded that she could not help herself because she had a dangerous military neighbor to the south. In this way every nation had an excuse for maintaining armaments.

Mr. HARDY. That was a crimination and a recrimination?

Mr. LONDON. Yes; but there is a great deal of historical truth in that, though.

Mr. HARDY. There is, but does not the gentleman think that one of the great essential elements was the writings of Bernhardi and the idea that might makes right?

Mr. LONDON. The theory that might makes right is not only a monarchical theory. When Rockefeller used his beneficent policy toward the strikers he followed the doctrine that might makes right.

Mr. HARDY. But he did not avow it?

Mr. LONDON. He did not avow it.

Mr. HARDY. Was there ever anywhere under the sun a country that evolved the construction that might makes right? Does the gentleman understand that any Member of this Congress advocates the doctrine of might makes right?

Mr. LONDON The idea that one nation is the cause of all the troubles of the world is absurd. Of course, Prussian militarism is a danger, and I do not see how it will be able to sustain itself now because of the liberalization of Russia. Russia has held up a torch of light for the rest of the world.

Mr. HARDY. Does not the gentleman think that somebody was to blame for bringing this war?

Mr. LONDON. I said that, chronologically, the first step that brought about this war was made by Austria-Hungary. As a matter of fact, it was not only that. It was a violation by Austria-Hungary of her agreement not to take away Bosnia and Herzegovina. That led to the war. You can trust——

Mr. HARDY. On the very eve of the war somebody did wrong?

Mr. LONDON. No doubt of it. And if we had a big army on the Canadian frontier, if we had a million soldiers on our side and a million on the Canadian side, with fortresses and fortifications, we would have no difficulty to find an excuse for an armed conflict with that country.

Mr. LOBECK. The fires had been smoldering in Europe for a long time?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. AUSTIN. The gentleman does not hold the Kaiser responsible?

Mr. LONDON. Primarily responsible. When we talk in such terms of reproach of the Kaiser, the trouble is that the Kaiser does not care. Of course, Austria-Hungary would never have dared to take that step without the promise of the support of the German Emperor. The problem, however, to-day, so far as we are concerned, is not with the historical causes of the war. We are dealing with the present situation. We are not interested in blaming Germany or England.

Mr. HARDY. I would be very much more interested if the gentleman would give us his view of what Russia is going to do now.

Mr. LONDON. Russia has rejected the idea of a separate peace, and for a number of reasons. She realizes that the presence of a colossal military power on a frontier of a thousand miles to the west of her is a serious menace. Revolutionary Russia can not afford to see republican France crushed, nor can she tolerate the wiping out of Belgium or the destruction of Serbia or any injustice to any of the little nationalities that now form a barrier to the ambition of Germany to penetrate to the east by land. And perhaps the most important reason of all is that the Socialists, who are such a powerful factor in the shaping of Russia's destiny, feel and think in terms of the universal and of internationalism. The Socialist always rises above the narrow limits of national thought. That is why Russia's reply to proposals of a separate peace was, "If you are compelled to make peace with us, we want you to make peace with the rest of the world." I was animated by the same thought when I sent my cable to the president of the soldiers' and workmen's council and expressed the hope that Russia would be a compelling factor for a universal and lasting peace. But what Russia does say to the world is this: "We are in distress; we have been in distress for centuries. We have suffered untold misery. We have gone through three years of war. You want us to continue. We want to continue, but we ask that every nation abandon imperialistic designs. We ask that the nations of the world seek and find a common basis upon which universal peace can be secured."

That is their plea. Is there any reason why their request should not be met by a spontaneous and sympathetic response on the part of all liberty-loving peoples?

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. I do not know whether the gentleman answered the question I have in mind or not. It is this: Could the Russians get together and unite in an effective resistance to the Germans?

Mr. LONDON. The skill with which the provisional government has met the extraordinary difficulties born of the revolution should be reassuring to all. They seem to have learned to combine enthusiasm with order, liberty with self-restraint. One would be justified in expecting that with the sudden release from oppressive restrictions the accumulated bitterness would have given rise to all sorts of excesses. The contrary is true. There is an almost complete absence of cruelty, an absence of the atrocities, that characterized the French Revolution. There are no women knitting stockings while heads are falling from the guillotine. They have abolished capital punishment. The Czar finds himself safe in the city of Petrograd, with hundreds of thousands of soldiers and workingmen, with red flags flying, around him. He was permitted to vote in the last municipal election.

All that shows the presence of a constructive statesmanship, which is so essential when a nation is being reborn. It shows a realization of the large responsibility that has fallen upon the shoulders of that long-suffering people. I have an abiding faith that the revolution in Russia has brought a stream of new life and liberty, not only for the people of Russia, but for all mankind. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Carr, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 13) extending the time within which the "Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to issue temporary permits for additional diversions of water from the Niagara River," shall remain in effect, had asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SMITH of Arizona, Mr. SHIELDS, and Mr. BRANDEGEE as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 67) to fix the status and rights of officers of the Public Health Service when serving with the Coast Guard, the Army, or the Navy.

DIVERSION OF THE WATERS OF NIAGARA RIVER.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, in reference to joint resolution 13, which has just come over from the Senate, I move that the House insist on its amendment and agree to the conference.

Mr. KEATING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. I will.

Mr. KEATING. The report just received from the Senate does not come as a surprise to the House. A few minutes ago the House very solemnly and seriously began consideration of a bill to use the waters of Niagara River. There had been inserted in the bill certain safeguards to protect the public interests. Those safeguards had been considered in the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and had been agreed to. They were brought out on the floor of this House, and with impressive solemnity, presented to the Members. When that action was taken it was understood by well-informed Members that the men who were in charge of the legislation had agreed on the following program: That the bill in the form it was reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs would be passed by this House; that it would be taken over to the Senate; that the Senate would disagree to the House amendments; that the bill would be brought back here; that a conference would be asked; that the House would be requested to remain in session until the conferees of the House and the Senate might get together and solemnly confer on this proposition; and that then a report would be brought into the House declaring that the Members representing the House had been unable to secure the safeguards thrown around the grant by the House—or at least the most important of them—and the membership of the House would be expected to agree to that finding.

The result of this farce, staged in this solemn way in the American House of Representatives, would be that certain monopolies in the vicinity of Niagara Falls would be permitted to continue to control the water power at Niagara Falls, worth many millions of dollars.

A year from now, when this temporary permit expires, these same gentlemen will again come into this House, and if the war is still in progress in Europe, we will be told that the permit must be extended as a war measure. If the war is not in progress in Europe, we will be told that the measure must be passed, because the business interests in the vicinity of Niagara Falls will be destroyed if we do not pass it.

The last time the measure was before the House, or possibly not the last time, but, at any rate, last December, before the holidays, I raised the point of no quorum and temporarily postponed action on the measure. At that time we were solemnly assured that if I insisted upon the point of no quorum thousands of men would be thrown out of employment and great industries would be closed down. It was then urged as a commercial proposition, and these men who control this monopoly then went so far as to communicate with the miners in my congressional district. I have the privilege of representing in part the greatest gold mining camp in the world. The miners of that camp were told that if their Representative insisted upon his point of order they would be thrown out of employment and the mines would close down, because the mills could not get the cyanide needed to treat the ore. Of course, my constituents are far too intelligent to be caught by such chaff.

Supporters of this measure are always talking about their desire to secure permanent legislation. The fact is, my friends, that the men who are now in control of this water power do not intend, if they can prevent it, that the Congress of the United States shall ever enact permanent legislation—unless it is the kind of permanent legislation they want. They seem to have power enough to prevent the passage of legislation which will enable the people of the United States to take control of this water power and administer it in the interest of all the people.

A point of no quorum at this stage of the proceedings will simply prevent a conference upon this proposition, perhaps not even that, for I do not know whether you have a quorum in town or not. I do not intend to make the point at this time. I will permit the resolution to go to conference, reserving the right to make the point of no quorum when the conference report is brought back on the floor of this House.

I do not mean to question the motives of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. I think he has endeavored to the limit of his ability to secure permanent legislation. Nevertheless, I take the liberty of urging the chairman and the other conferees to insist upon the House provisions. To my mind it is perfectly absurd to say that if this legislation is not passed war preparations will be seriously interfered with. I have no doubt that in an emergency the Secretary of War or the President of the United States would have the power to commandeer this power plant and use this water power which belongs to the Federal Government. So, as far as interfering with war preparations is concerned, I do not think any Member of this House has any reason to hesitate to oppose this legislation on that score. The membership of this House should call the bluff of these gentlemen who control the water power at Niagara Falls and who have the temerity to set up the claim that they have a right to control it without regard to this permit. I believe that without this permit they would be acting in violation of law; that they would have no color of title; but that question I recognize must eventually be determined by the courts of the land. I think Congress should take steps, however, to see to it that the question is settled once and for all; and that without unnecessary delay.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. I do not know about the merits of this measure. There is a great water power, as I understand it, at Niagara Falls. I judge from the gentleman's remarks, not being present when the matter was considered to-day, that the House is one way and the Senate is the other, and so far up to this time there has been no adjustment. If there is not any adjustment, and the water does not turn any wheels, I suppose the water will continue to run over the dam, and what will then happen?

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, the answer to that, if the gentleman will permit, is that the water will not continue to run over the dam. These gentlemen will continue to do what they have done for years. For years they used this water without a permit and in violation of law, according to the Secretary of War.

Mr. CANNON. If there is not anything in extremis, I have nothing further to say.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is mistaken about the water not running over the dam if this legislation is not passed. The Federal Government assumed control of the water of Niagara River in 1906, and passed a law authorizing the issuing of permits for the diversion of water up to 15,600 cubic feet per second. That law was to remain in force for three years. It expired by limitation and was renewed on two occasions. It has run out, and the power companies have been using the water that was granted under those permits by the acquiescence of the Secretary of War without permits. Last January Congress passed a resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to grant additional permits for 4,400 cubic feet per second of water, making 20,000 cubic feet altogether, which is the full quantity this country was authorized to grant permits for the diversion of under the treaty with Great Britain. Those permits, under the resolution, expire to-morrow. If these companies take any portion of the 4,400 cubic feet per second of water after the permit expires, the resolution which we passed in January imposes very heavy penalties upon them; so heavy that they could not afford to take the water, as it not only involves fines, but imprisonment of the officers of the company as well, so that part of the water will not be diverted unless this resolution is passed. There is a difference between the House and the Senate. I believe the views of the House were embodied in the resolution reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs. That resolution certainly embodies my views and the views of that committee, and I believe the views of the House. The Senate is violently opposed to some of the principles laid down in this resolution, and I very frankly stated to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] that in the emergency which faces this country now, that if I could not get all that I wanted in this resolution, that I would not defeat its passage by insisting upon having all that I wanted. And if it came to the question of failing to get this legislation through or surrendering my views in reference to the matter to which I referred, I would surrender my views, as I believed it to be for the good of this country in its war emergency. [Applause.] I am as much in favor of the principles of this resolution as the gentleman from Colorado, but if I can not get all I want I will yield some matters in order to get an agreement.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. I will.

Mr. CRAMTON. Are we to understand then that the program we are following is equivalent to a motion to concur in the action of the Senate?

Mr. FLOOD. I do not know that the Senate conferees will insist upon the Senate bill, but if they do insist and we can not get them to yield and I am one of the conferees I do not expect to defeat this legislation by insisting upon all of my views.

Mr. CRAMTON. If the House conferees so publicly announce their readiness to recede, we might as well concur without a conference.

Mr. FLOOD. There are other amendments that the House placed on this proposition besides the amendment referred to by the gentleman from Colorado that should go to conference, and the gentleman is mistaken in suggesting that there was anything farcical in the proceedings this morning.

Mr. AUSTIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. I will.

Mr. AUSTIN. Is it not a fact the Secretary of War and Gen. Black both recommended this temporary permit we passed at the last session of Congress be extended for another year?

Mr. FLOOD. Not as the Senate passed it.

Mr. AUSTIN. The renewal or the extension of the temporary permit we passed at the last session of Congress?

Mr. FLOOD. The Senate resolution provided for an extension for one year of the resolution we passed last January. The Secretary of War suggested a very important amendment, giving larger and broader powers to the War Department to control the use of the power generated from the use of this water.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I should like to ask if this resolution in itself does not embody the recommendations made by the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers?

Mr. FLOOD. It does and goes further.

Mr. AUSTIN. Because you embrace all the water power of Niagara Falls, not the 4,400 cubic feet given in the temporary permit given at the last session of Congress.

Mr. FLOOD. That is correct, except the permit was to July 1, 1917, a little more than five months.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow further?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. When does this gentlemen's agreement that I understood was made to-day to adjourn three days at a time begin?

Mr. FLOOD. It begins as soon as this legislation gets through, whether to-day or to-morrow.

Mr. CANNON. If it does not get through to-day or to-morrow this gentlemen's agreement is of no account?

Mr. FLOOD. The agreement has not been made yet.

Mr. CANNON. I thought the agreement was made.

Mr. FLOOD. The understanding is when this legislation gets through.

Mr. CANNON. I thought the agreement had been made.

Mr. FLOOD. It has been made in that way.

Mr. CANNON. Then that gentleman's agreement will not go into effect until this bill is disposed of? I had a different impression; I was not present when it was made.

Mr. FLOOD. I concur in much that the gentleman from Colorado has said about the power situation at Niagara Falls, but this resolution is being pressed not for the benefit of the power companies. It is because we need for the use of our Army and Navy the articles made by the electrical power which the use of this water generates.

Now is not the time to bring the power companies at Niagara Falls or the users of their power to account. I hope the time may come soon when we can do so. I will welcome it. But it is not now.

The Secretary of War and everyone familiar with the products made from electrical power generated at Niagara Falls tell us that everything made there is used in manufacturing war material.

Niagara Falls is the center of the electrochemical industry of this country, and the products made there are vitally essential to the various other industries upon which our national defense directly rests.

A partial list of the Niagara Falls manufacturing companies, their products and uses, which have been furnished me is as follows:

Union Carbide Co., Electro-Metallurgical Co., Hooker Electro-Chemical Co., Oldbury Electro-Chemical Co., the Carborundum Co., the Norton Co., the General Abrasive Co. (Inc.), Isco Chemical Co. (Inc.), Niagara Alkali Co., Electro Bleaching Gas Co., Star Electric Co., National Carbon Co., Acheson Graphite Co., Aluminum Co. of America, National Electrolytic Co., United States Light & Heat Corp., Castner Electrolytic Co., Titanium Alloys Mfg. Co., Niagara Electro-Chemical Co.

The products of many of these plants are either not made elsewhere in the United States or if so made elsewhere are produced in negligible quantities.

The products of these Niagara plants embrace the following articles which are used as indicated below in other industries, viz:

Ferrosilicon, ferromolybdenum, ferrotungsten, ferrochromium form the chief constituents of the group comprising high-speed tool manufacture and utilization. High-speed steel has tripled the capacity of the machine shops and the efficiency of every metal worker in the Nation. They are of supreme importance to the building of every modern battleship, submarine, and their guns and armor. Without these metals or their alloys, a large proportion of our steel and metal industries would find themselves in the condition of practically 20 years ago.

Ferrotitanium: Bessemer and open-hearth steel processes and in steel castings.

Cuprotitanium: Used in copper and bronze castings.

Carborundum and alundum: Abrasives or grinding materials necessary in all metal-working industries, and for grinding shells, gun barrels, bayonets, knives, and aeroplane and automobile cylinders. These abrasives are the only means of fashioning armor plate and are essential in the making of hard steel tools and similar articles.

Silicon metal: Essential in silicon steel for electric machinery in all new electrically-propelled battleships. Used also with caustic soda for generating hydrogen for aeronautical purposes.

Chlorine products, chlorine compounds, including chlor benzol, chlor toluol, chloroform, caustic soda: These products in their various forms and ramifications of usefulness are the bases of picric and benzoic acid and trinitrotoluol, used in the manufacture of high explosives; also necessary in Army and Navy sanitation, surgery, and medicine.

Carbon, graphitized carbons, and graphite: Essential in making cartridges and primers, electric steel, vanadium, tungsten, molybdenum, silicon metal, stellite, batteries, and for lubrication; much needed by cartridge manufacturers and United States arsenals.

Aluminum: Essential for the manufacture of mess kits and canteens used by the Army and Navy; for castings for engines for aeroplanes; for structural shapes required for Zeppelin airships now under construction and for aeroplanes; for voice tubing in battleships; used for time fuses on shrapnel and high-explosive shells; the making of "ammonal," a high explosive used extensively abroad; in automobile and motor-truck construction; in illuminating bombs; as a deoxidizing agent in steel making.

Calcium carbide (acetylene and oxyacetylene): Necessary for lighting of beacons, buoys on sea coasts, harbors, and inland waters, and other methods of illumination impossible otherwise without reconstruction. For welding in navy yards and metal works. For signal lights, search lights, flare lights. Over 70 per cent of miners' lights are from calcium carbide, and the whole mining industry depends upon supply thereof.

It follows that all these industries depend upon the hydro-electric power developed at Niagara Falls, which is in turn dependent upon the authorized diversion of water. It is obvious that the importation of any of the products so made by them essential or useful for the national defense is impossible now, and to leave the sole available sources of supply in America without adequate electrical energy for the operation of their plants would be suicidal.

The Secretary of War wrote me the following letter:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 2, 1917.

THE CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
House of Representatives.

SIR: Supplementing my letter of April 25, referring to Senate joint resolution 15, permit me to say that it was my intention to recommend the passage of the suggested amendment authorizing the Secretary of War to issue temporary permits for additional diversion of water from the Niagara River as an emergency measure growing out of the existing state of war.

Very respectfully,
NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

In his testimony before the committee he said:

I have a feeling that practically everything made by the use of this power at Niagara Falls is war material. All of the abrasive material, chlorides, and the various alloys, all of them are war material.

He phoned me that the passage of this resolution was of the greatest importance, and asked me to recede upon the amendment which he had suggested to the Senate resolution.

In these circumstances I will not insist upon all of my views, if by so doing I will defeat this resolution. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the House insisting upon its amendments to the Senate joint resolution.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints the following conferees.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. FLOOD, Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas, and Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on June 21, 1917, approved and signed bill and joint resolution of the following titles:

H. R. 3673. An act to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, as amended by the acts of August 4, 1914, August 15, 1914, March 3, 1915, and September 7, 1916; and

H. J. Res. 105. Joint resolution to correct an error in the sundry civil appropriation act for the fiscal year 1918.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 2434. An act authorizing the counties of Cass and Itasca, Minn., to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River between said counties; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. 2482. An act to reinstate Armor S. Heffley as a second lieutenant in the United States Marine Corps; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

DESIGN OF THE CURRENT QUARTER DOLLAR.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair lays before the House a Senate resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (S. 2099) providing for the modification of the design of the current quarter dollar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

DIVERSION OF WATER, NIAGARA RIVER.

Mr. KITCHIN. We have been waiting for the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] to come back with his conference report on the bill relating to the diversion of water from the Niagara River. I wonder if some gentleman would not like to take some time?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I would like to have 10 minutes on this Niagara resolution.

Mr. KITCHIN. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman may have 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY] may proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING], in speaking on the resolution that was passed here this afternoon, said that his objection to the passage of the resolution was this, that so long as we have these temporary permits we would not obtain any permanent legislation.

Now, that assumes that we have before us an ordinary question of whether or not those who are using the power at Niagara Falls shall be permitted to continue that use. That is not the condition of affairs at all. That is not the question which the House has to consider. The question which is before the House is quite an unusual one.

Let us see what the situation at Niagara was when this resolution was first considered by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and how it happened to come before the committee. There was an international joint commission, and they decided that we might use 20,000 cubic feet of water on this side, and that the Canadians might use 36,000 cubic feet. Over in Canada they are using their entire 36,000 cubic feet, but on this side, up to a year ago we never had used over 15,600 cubic feet. A year ago permission was given by the two Houses of Congress to use the remaining 4,400 cubic feet, growing out of this situation: Great industries had developed in Niagara Falls. It had become the electrochemical center of the world. More than that, these industries had become important to the whole Nation in this way: There are raw materials made there which enter into the manufacture of all of our great basic products. Take, for instance, the automobile industry. The automobile had been cheapened and reduced in price immeasurably through the improved abrasive products, produced through electricity at Niagara Falls. Take steel and rapid steel. Seventy per cent of all the steel in the United States had to have ferroalloys, and they are produced only at Niagara. Rapid steel had reduced the necessity of employing labor to the extent that the efficiency of practically every steel manufactory in the country had been increased to double its former capacity. So the industries of the country had grown to depend on Niagara to the extent that the use of this additional power was necessary, not for Niagara alone but for the country at large.

Now, that temporary permit is about to expire. Who asked that it be continued? Not the manufacturers; not the people at large in the country. Their interests were great enough, but the person who asked that that permit be extended was the Secretary of War of the United States. Why? Because he said every one of the manufactured products produced at Niagara went into the manufacture of munitions, and every one of them was necessary to the making of munitions. In other words, they were necessary to the production of the munitions which we must have in carrying on this war and in order to produce them that power is absolutely necessary.

I just want to read enough from the hearing to show the House that I am not magnifying or overstating what the Secretary said to the committee on that subject. I want to show that I am stating it as he stated it, that I am not stating it any more strongly, but that I am stating the situation as it actually exists and has been found to be by the Secretary of War, who has this matter in charge, and whose duty it is to find the facts. I read from his testimony before the committee.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER], a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee, asked the Secretary of War:

In your judgment, it is necessary for the public interest that this additional power be allowed to be developed?

Secretary BAKER. I think it is.

The CHAIRMAN. You look upon this as an emergency measure growing out of the existing state of war?

Secretary BAKER. Yes.

No action had been taken by the committee, and after the Senate had passed the resolution unanimously, within 10 days after the Secretary called it to the attention of the Senate, the matter had been allowed to lapse on this side and remain without action for six weeks or more, and the Secretary of War sent a letter, of which this is the concluding sentence:

* * * It was my intention to recommend the passage of the suggested amendment authorizing the Secretary of War to issue a temporary permit for additional diversion of water from the Niagara River as an emergency measure growing out of the existing state of war.

Mr. CRAMTON. Do I understand that letter asked for an additional diversion of water?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. As provided in the House proposition?

Mr. DEMPSEY. No; not as provided in the House proposition, and I will come right to that question in a moment. I should like to finish what the Secretary of War and Gen. Black said upon the necessity, and then I will call attention to the difference between the resolution which passed the Senate and that passed by the House:

Secretary BAKER. I have a feeling—and it is a generalization which may be subject to some exceptions—but I have a feeling that practically everything made by the use of this power at Niagara Falls is war material. All that I know are war materials. All of the abrasive materials, chlorides, and the various alloys—all of them are war materials.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] suggested the amendment at the end of the House resolution, which provides for an investigation which shall be conducted to enable the Congress to pass permanent legislation. The Secretary was asked whether he thought that should be added to the resolution, and he said this:

The language—

Of the paragraph proposing this investigation—is entirely apt, and the only hesitancy I have in expressing an opinion is whether it would delay the passage of the joint resolution. If it should have that effect, it would be unfortunate.

Then Gen. Black said:

I am in entire accord with what the Secretary said on that, but whether this is the time or not is another question. The most essential thing for the need of the country is this joint resolution, and nothing should go in there which would prevent giving the Secretary power, if possible, with the additional conditions he asks, to allow this continued diversion authorized in your joint resolution of last January. That is the most essential thing that must go through. These other things we would like to see go through, provided it does not imperil that.

Then Gen. Black said further:

If you will permit me, I would like to make a couple of suggestions. One thing is this: What is the use of having this fight year after year?

The Secretary suggested that instead of this resolution extending the time for a single year it should run for two years, to July, 1919, instead of July, 1918. The resolution as passed here and in the Senate provides for only one year; but Gen. Black said:

Why not let this resolution now go along so as to enable Congress to form permanent legislation whenever it can? We do know that just at present we have this emergency war measure; these industries are also depending on this power. Those industries are very important to the whole Nation all the time, and therefore it seems to me that it would be very injudicious to cut down the use of power there at Niagara Falls at this time, and that we should, then, before you begin to legislate further on the subject, have full information before Congress, so that the permanent legislation may be based upon full information. The other suggestion I was going to submit is this: If there be any danger that this addition to the resolution would imperil it, then why would it not be perfectly proper to have a separate resolution and have it considered on its own merits?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I ask for five minutes more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Now, I am coming to the difference in the two resolutions, and I am coming not alone to describe that, but the attitude of the Secretary and of Gen. Black toward the two resolutions—the one in the Senate and the one here. The resolution in the Senate simply extends the time one year for the use of 4,400 cubic feet. The resolution of the House deals with the whole 20,000 cubic feet, and provides that if these companies at Niagara use that 20,000 cubic feet after the end of one year they commit a criminal act, and that those who use it are punishable not alone by fine but by imprisonment.

Let us see for a moment. Here we are practically at the end of the session. The only thing that stands in the way of granting what the Secretary asks—the use of these 4,400 cubic feet to enable these war materials to be made—is the fact that we are at the end of the session, and that some gentleman may, despite the fact that it is asked as a war measure, despite the fact that we need these materials to carry on this war, may make the point of no quorum. Suppose this war continues another year, and suppose the Committee on Foreign Affairs should delay just as they have this year up practically to the end of the session, and suppose that you stood to the resolution passed in this House embracing the whole 20,000 cubic feet—and I am not discussing for a moment the rights of the parties; I am not discussing the property rights, but I am discussing simply the war question—suppose you came a year from now to the end of the session as you are now, and suppose the war is still going on, and that the wheels at Niagara are stopped, you are going to need steel, you are going to need these various alloys to make practically every war material you use, and you will not be able to make any of them if some one Member of this House says, "I make the point of order that there is no quorum present."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I yield first to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. If this legislation should fail, has not the President the power, under the national-defense act, to take over these plants up there and proceed with the manufacture of such materials as are needed for the prosecution of the war?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I am not familiar enough with those acts to answer the gentleman directly, but I should say this in answer to his question: Where there are two acts on the statute books, and they both can stand, it is the primary rule of construction that they both shall stand. Here is a law which makes it a crime to use these 4,400 additional feet. Whether a public officer would have the right to use those additional 4,400 cubic feet in face of that prohibition I should deem very doubtful indeed. I doubt whether any of us are above the law. I doubt whether the fact that the President is President gives him the right, because he has a right to commandeer plants, to use water power which this Congress has said can not be used without the commission of a crime. I think that the President and the Secretary of War are subject to law the same as the rest of us, and I know of no exception in the statute which says that because a man is a public officer he can violate the law which, when he assumes office, he solemnly swears he will defend and enforce.

Mr. WALSH. Just one other question: Can the gentleman imagine any United States attorney prosecuting the President or any of his officials for carrying out his orders issued as Commander in Chief of the armed forces in manufacturing war materials and using this water under the national-defense act, if he has that power?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I answer the gentleman in this way: If it is right to use this power, if this power should be used—and the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers and Gen. Crozier, the head of the Ordnance Department, all say it is absolutely necessary—I do not believe that Congress should be afraid to pass the legislation giving them the power to use it, and I do not believe that we should leave it a matter of construction whether or not a crime is being committed in the use of it.

Mr. WALSH. I say to the gentleman that I am not afraid; I am willing to support the resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I ask this for the purpose of yielding to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING].

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Massachusetts asked the question which I had in mind when I rose and asked the gentleman to yield, which was as to the power of the President to take over these plants if necessary and operate them in the public interest. If the gentleman will bear with me for a moment, I will call his attention to the fact that we have just passed a joint resolution which will permit the use of this water by these power companies, and if it were not for some willful gentlemen at the other end of the Capitol that measure would now be on its way to the President of the United States. So that I think the gentleman should address some of his indignation to that small group of willful men at the other end of the Capitol.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Now, I would like to say this—first I will yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. AUSTIN. I wanted a little time myself when the gentleman finishes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask one question of the gentleman for information.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, if it is a good thing to do this, why not bring in a permanent law here, and what is the sense of having this thing up here every session of Congress? We had it up last winter and came very near losing out on it, and now they come in and want another extension. Why not have a permanent law and be through with it if it is a good thing?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I am very much delighted the Speaker put that question, because I want to say a word upon just that phase of the subject. The House of Representatives did bring in a permanent measure at the last annual session. I am from that district. Now, I might be accused of personal or selfish interest, but I appeal to the membership of this House—and some of the members of the committee are here—to bear witness to this fact, that when that permanent legislation came before this House, although I offered some small minor amendments, I offered no amendment which was not accepted by the committee in full; and after I had, with the consent of the committee, offered one amendment, and it carried, first by viva voce and then a standing vote, and when tellers were demanded, and Members were going through between the tellers, the gentleman from Virginia, the chairman of this committeé [Mr. FLOOD], came to me and said he would have to withdraw his consent at that stage; and, although I angered men who were my supporters—one of them, the gentleman from Washington, would not speak to me for days and said I had no right to withdraw the amendment I had offered—yet my desire was so great to show that the community in which I was interested and where I lived, which was vitally interested in this legislation, was so desirous of showing their wish to have permanent legislation acceptable to the whole country that at that stage I withdrew the amendment, and we passed permanent legislation in this body, but we passed it so late that it was not acted upon by the Senate. Now, there is no one in the world so anxious to have permanent legislation as those who live in the vicinity of the great cataract. We are living there day by day, from hand to mouth, in daily terror of just such a situation as is created here. For one month last winter, because of the point of no quorum, when wages were high but when the cost of living was equally high, when coal reached the highest price it had reached for years, when men needed wages as they never needed them before, the point of no quorum was made on this floor, and for one month laboring men to the number of 3,000 walked the streets of Niagara Falls and the frontier cities without a dollar. Are not we anxious, then, for permanent legislation? Forty-two thousand dollars in wages was lost because the point of no quorum was made; labor suffered as it never suffered before. Why, the manufacturers could stand it. We did not get sufficient light at Niagara Falls because of the point of no quorum; we had insufficient light at other places.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Before that, I desire to ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow. I do this because we expected to adjourn to-day until Monday or Tuesday, but on this very proposition the conferees have not agreed, and I understand Mr. FLOOD said that they probably will not be able to report the bill to the House until to-morrow at 11 o'clock, so I ask unanimous consent that when we adjourn to-day we adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 a. m. to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Reserving the right to object, does the gentleman intend to make any further request?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; one other.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then I do not object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection?

Mr. KITCHIN. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that when the House adjourns to-morrow that it adjourn to meet at 12 o'clock on Tuesday following.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-morrow it shall adjourn until 12 o'clock Tuesday next. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman, so that it may be clear to all, does he intend that any business shall be transacted on Tuesday?

Mr. KITCHIN. Just as I stated this morning, I understand the gentleman's agreement will go into effect and nothing will be done, as soon as we finish this bill that is under consideration now.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And on Tuesday there will be a request——

Mr. KITCHIN. To go over until Friday.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And on neither day will any business be taken up?

Mr. KITCHIN. No business will be taken up.

Mr. SIMS. Are we now committing ourselves to an agreement for adjournment next Tuesday for three days?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The request of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] is that when the House adjourns to-morrow it adjourn until Tuesday next.

Mr. SIMS. All right. I understood the gentleman from North Carolina to answer the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] that the intention was to follow it with other unanimous-consent requests.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from North Carolina if on Tuesday next any business will be permitted?

Mr. KITCHIN. No; I do not think there ought to be.

Mr. WALSH. Not even by unanimous consent?

Mr. KITCHIN. No.

Mr. DALLINGER. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman a question and to call his attention to this: It was stated that the gentleman's agreement early in the day was based on the assumption that this Niagara Falls matter could be gotten out of the way. Now, suppose that to-morrow the point of no quorum is raised and a quorum is not obtained, may I ask the gentleman from North Carolina what is to be done then? Will an attempt be made to obtain a quorum and pass the bill?

Mr. KITCHIN. If we can not get a quorum here to-morrow, Saturday, this would go over until Tuesday; but it would have to go over until Monday, anyway, and we could not get a quorum here Monday. I understand that on July 1 this license expires.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. To-morrow is the last day on which they are authorized to use the water.

Mr. KITCHIN. If we can not get it through to-morrow the time will expire, and we could wait for the following Monday and take it up again.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. There is a penal provision. If they use any water after to-morrow they will go to jail.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. When is it expected that general legislation will be taken up again?

Mr. KITCHIN. Monday week, July 9. I explained that very fully this morning.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. How long will that continue?

Mr. KITCHIN. We will come back July 9 and take up this trading-with-the-enemy bill.

Mr. SIMS. Suppose the conference reports on the food bills, or either one of them, get back here. Is it the purpose to delay action on them?

Mr. KITCHIN. Until July 9.

Mr. SIMS. Then I will oppose any agreement that undertakes to block action on these conference reports.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman was here this morning when that whole matter was thoroughly explained.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. LEVER, as I understood, said distinctly that he expected to get an early agreement on the bill that was sent to conference to-day.

Mr. KITCHIN. And he hoped to bring them in on Monday week. I saw Mr. LEVER only half an hour ago.

Mr. SIMS. Is it possible that all this food legislation is to be deliberately delayed by unanimous consent of the House?

Mr. KITCHIN. No; it is not the intention to delay action on this food legislation, and the gentleman does not think it will be back here next week. I do not think we can have a possible quorum here until next Friday, at least.

Mr. SIMS. Then only those who are absent will be responsible for the failure to carry this legislation through.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman want all the Members to remain here on the Fourth of July? That is the real question.

Mr. KITCHIN. Of course, the gentleman from Tennessee is in a good position to say, "Stay here," because he will stay here anyway. Does the gentleman think the House should stay here on the possibility of the Senate taking action? I talked with two or three of the Senators, and one said it would certainly take 10 days. Another said three weeks, and still another said it will probably get over here Tuesday or Wednesday. Does the gentleman think we ought to stay here on a possibility of the Senate doing things that are not likely?

Mr. SIMS. Will we not know more about that next Tuesday than we know now?

Mr. KITCHIN. I am asking unanimous consent to adjourn over until Tuesday, with the understanding that there will be no business transacted on Tuesday. That was the understanding, and many gentlemen have left.

Mr. LENROOT. If by any chance that could be agreed upon by Tuesday, could it be understood that Members would be notified to be here Friday?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Was it not a part of the understanding this morning that it would be proper, if that report came in, to ask for unanimous consent to have it sent to conference, and in the absence of objection that it might then go?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; in the absence of objection. That is correct.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn until 12 o'clock Tuesday. Is there objection?

Mr. DICKINSON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, after you meet on Tuesday is it your purpose to ask to adjourn for three days?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; to adjourn over until Friday. If the food bill——

Mr. SIMS. Either of them——

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; either of them comes over, then unanimous consent will be asked to send them to conference. If unanimous consent is not given——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then if the point of no quorum is raised you are no better off.

Mr. SIMS. To-morrow there may be more opportunity to know about the prospect to have legislation next week than there is now. The gentleman refers to me personally. My family is not here. I am as lonely here as the gentleman from North Carolina is. I want to get this food bill through at the very earliest possible moment.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman is probably no more anxious now to get this bill through than he was this morning, when there was no objection made to it. I was trying to get that through and to fix the time when you could get up the trading-with-the-enemy bill and to facilitate action on the bill then pending. The gentleman then made no objection.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] was present then, and these are bills that he has charge of.

Mr. KITCHIN. He consented to that arrangement, provided they would let him go to conference on the food-survey bill that was then at the Speaker's desk.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, this request can be submitted to-morrow just as well as now, and I will have an opportunity to look into it.

Mr. HULBERT. A number of Members have already gone——

Mr. KITCHIN. A lot of Members have gone away now; and, to be candid with the gentleman, the reason I made the request this afternoon is that everybody in the House thought it was the understanding this morning, just as I stated. It was fairly and squarely put before the House; several Members have gone; and now about making this request to-morrow, you know there might be some little feeling, and some one might get up here to-morrow and make the point of no quorum, and then I could not make this request. This Niagara Falls bill is coming back, and if it does not go exactly like some gentlemen want it they may make the point of no quorum, and then I can not make the request.

Mr. SIMS. I will be frank with the gentleman. Perhaps he has talked with the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. KITCHIN. I have seen him.

Mr. SIMS. And did he then say he was perfectly willing?

Mr. KITCHIN. It was perfectly satisfactory to him.

Mr. SIMS. For the House to adjourn until Tuesday?

Mr. KITCHIN. He was perfectly willing to have the understanding that we had this morning, to take up nothing until Monday week, and that these bills be returnable then. In the meantime, suppose they returned the food-supply bill here on Tuesday, he would know who were going to be the conferees on the part of the House, and the Senate will know who are going to be the conferees on the part of the Senate, and they would get together and go over the matters, and they would not lose a bit of time.

Mr. SIMS. It is now nearly 6 o'clock, and of course with the statement of the gentleman from North Carolina that the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture [Mr. LEVER] has agreed to this adjournment over until Tuesday——

Mr. KITCHIN. No; to the arrangement we made this morning, which was that we would adjourn every three days, beginning with the adjournment this week, and not take up anything until Monday week.

Mr. SIMS. There was no agreement to that. He means that proposition in the House——

Mr. KITCHIN. That proposition, not to take up anything until Monday week.

Mr. SIMS. On that understanding with the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER], which of course I do not question, that he agreed to a three-day adjournment until Tuesday, I shall not object to that, but I certainly shall object to any agreement being entered into here which may be used to prevent the consideration of either of these food bills when they do come back, when the Senate passes them.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield to me? The gentleman certainly does not reflect on the speed with which the House has considered these bills?

Mr. KITCHIN. Let us get this agreement first.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think the gentleman is going to agree. I do not think he means to reflect upon the House, which has certainly been expeditious in its work up to this time. The fault is not with this body. I think the gentleman will agree to that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent——

Mr. RANDALL. I should like to ask the gentleman if he has any information in regard to the plan in holding this other food bill back.

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not understand the gentleman.

Mr. RANDALL. It has been here on the Speaker's table.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think we have kept it on the Speaker's table to see what the Senate would do with the second bill. It may be they will incorporate the whole thing in that, and then this would not be necessary.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-morrow it stand adjourned until 12 o'clock Tuesday. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KITCHIN. Now, let me make a statement to the House and to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS]. There was a bill pending from the gentleman's committee this morning, and he and his committee were very anxious to get that bill through. It was generally supposed there was no quorum in the city then, certainly not in the House. Some gentlemen who are not very favorably impressed with that bill and the trading-with-the-enemy bill, and probably do not want to go on with it, might make some objection or raise the point of no quorum. I discussed the matter with the chairman of the gentleman's committee, in the presence of the gentleman from Tennessee, and we thought it would be better, in order to facilitate the passage of the bills, that the gentleman's committee had, to fix a time certain for the trading-with-the-enemy bill, and make the arrangement contained in the proposition that I made to the House. The gentleman from Tennessee then made no objection either one way or the other when I was talking with the chairman of his committee nor when I made the proposition to the House. That proposition did help the gentleman to facilitate the passage of his bill and to fix a day for the trading-with-the-enemy bill. I do not think it is the proper thing for the gentleman, after getting his bill through and fixing the time for another bill, when that proposition was made and understood by the House, now to take advantage of it.

Mr. SIMS. I am not undertaking to take any advantage. The bill before the House this morning was the bill providing for preferential shipments. I had no interest in it. That was a public bill, and I would not have jeopardized the early consideration of the food bill for a moment. The gentleman insinuated that I wanted to trade. I had no thought of that, and I repudiate any such insinuation. I think the food bills are necessary to this country, and I thought the bill authorizing preferential shipments was absolutely necessary, and I think so yet; but the trading-with-the-enemy bill is not so necessary for immediate action.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman jumps to the conclusion that I was trying to involve him in a trade.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman said it was my bill. It was not my bill; it was the whole country's bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman ought to have made the point this morning.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. All this proceeding is by unanimous consent.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House to-morrow, after the reading of the Journal, for 10 minutes on the Niagara water-power bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to address the House to-morrow, immediately after reading of the Journal. Is there objection?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. CRAMTON. Has the other request been granted?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The request that when we adjourn to-morrow we adjourn until Tuesday has been granted.

Mr. AUSTIN. I make my request not to interfere with conference reports.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Would it not be feasible for the gentleman to take 10 minutes on the conference report?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The matter will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 3331. An act for the protection of the owners of desert-land entrymen who enter the military or naval service of the United States in time of war was read by its title and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

DIVERSION OF THE WATERS OF NIAGARA RIVER.

Mr. SHIELDS. I desire to present a conference report in regard to a matter on account of which the House is remaining in session. I ask that the conference report be read, and will then move its adoption.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Tennessee presents a conference report, which will be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the report, which is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 13) extending the time within which the "Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to issue temporary permits for additional diversions of water from the Niagara River" shall remain in effect, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to Senate joint resolution No. 13, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by the amendment of the House to said Senate joint resolution No. 13 insert the following:

"That public resolution No. 45 of the Sixty-fourth Congress, approved January 19, 1917, entitled 'Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to issue temporary permits for additional diversions of water from the Niagara River,' is continued in full force and effect and under the same conditions, restrictions, and limitations until July 1, 1918: Provided, That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to make a comprehensive and thorough investigation, including all necessary surveys and maps, of the entire subject of water diversion from the Great Lakes and the Niagara River, including navigation, sanitary and power purposes, and the preservation of the scenic beauty of Niagara Falls and the rapids of Niagara River, and to report to Congress thereon at the earliest practicable date. To carry out the provisions of this proviso there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $25,000."

And the House agree to the same.

M. A. SMITH,
JOHN K. SHIELDS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
H. D. FLOOD,
W. S. GOODWIN,
Managers on the part of the House.

During the reading of the report,

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator desire the joint resolution read as proposed to be amended?

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, I should like to have it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will continue the reading of the report.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the conference report.

Mr. SHIELDS. I will say to the Senator from Wisconsin that the only amendment to the joint resolution as passed by the Senate is the one authorizing a survey.

I move the adoption of the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled joint resolutions, and they were signed by the Vice President:

S. J. Res. 13. Joint resolution extending the time within which the "Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to issue temporary permits for additional diversions of water from Niagara River," shall remain in effect; and

S. J. Res. 67. Joint resolution to fix the status and rights of officers of the Public Health Service when serving with the Coast Guard, the Army, or the Navy.

CONSERVATION OF FOOD AND FUEL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4961) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, the Senate has for some days been discussing the pending bill, which for short title has been referred to as a food-control bill. It is now my purpose to submit my views upon it. To some of the Senate Members these views will not be convincing, to many not interesting, but to me they are necessary both to hold and express.

This measure, Mr. President, very naturally has awakened a very great divergence of opinion. It has given occasion to expressions of very opposing views. The Senate is to be congratulated for that it has presented to the world one of the elevated discussions upon the great fundamentals of our Government freed in every way from the suggestion of partisanship. The debates have partaken of the character of honest division upon ideas and ideals. At no time have we had the spectacle presented of any representative of any State viewing this measure solely through the expediency of party advantage or political profit. This exhibition can well invite the wonder of those countries of the world that heretofore have misinterpreted our political character, and it can challenge the attention of those who have fancied that party differences which they have frequently seen in other matters—exhibited to a point of national dissensions—would have divided us at this national juncture.

For my own sake, and speaking from my personal point of view, I regard it as a valuable exhibit, and of great influence throughout the earth, that at this particular time the world can behold that as to measures for carrying on this war against our aggressors the only difference of opinion amongst us is as to the best way it can be conducted with success.

Mr. President, I am forced to bring myself to reflection upon the situation which has called for legislation of this nature. I wonder if this very excellent and busy body of eminent men, able, in the different pursuits which engage their minds, have had time to contemplate that to-day in the world is a spectacle unparalleled in anything which history has ever presented, and which, of course, all our prayers invoke Heaven may never find a duplicate in civilization.

Fourteen countries of the world, thirteen of which profess Christianity, are at war, flying at the heart of their fellow men with the single object of their destruction. Twenty-five million people moved from out of the ordinary pursuits of life, placed in the ranks where they are challenged by death to die, or fight that they shall live. Fifty million dollars a day sacrificed to the undertaking by four of the dominant countries; ten million per day each by six of the others engaged; five million per day by three of the remaining. Up to date three years of this condition the experience of all. Twenty-five million women and countless children at this particular point impaled upon the uncertainty as to how they shall live, where they shall live, in what manner they can survive, through and by what agency will they be preserved. Theirs to us is the Macedonian cry, "Come over and help us!"

Sir, the very first stage of war is demand for food. There can be no preservation of liberty for a people without sustenance to the individual. There can be no success of arms without food to maintain the warrior. There can be no achievement of countries without capacity being assured and opportunity provided for the salvation of that country through the chief instrumentality which preserves mankind and countries alike—food.

Mr. President, the question for the Senate, of course, is what is the best method we may adopt to achieve this very necessary and laudable undertaking of providing food. Food not only for ourselves but food for those who are cooperating with us in the struggle which we have heralded to the world is a contest on our part for liberty to nations, for justice to man, and righteousness for civilization.

Mr. President, at this point I wish upon my own responsibility to disown the assertion that comes from many quarters that those countries for whom we are preparing our generosities are our allies. Speaking for myself, sir, I deny that the United States of America has any European allies. I deny that there has ever been the proceeding necessary to bring about the result from which America can say she has allies of any European country. For myself I dispute that the President of the United States could ever affirm the statement from any source that he has, as an Executive, entered into any understanding which brings this country into the relation of an ally with any European country.

There may be those—indeed there are those, whose cause is common with ours, whose grievances are the same as ours, who are fighting to the same object as we are; but, sir, in this they are cooperating with us; we are cooperating with them to the same given end; but there are no European allies of America, there are no fixed and contracted responsibilities of America to any European Government upon a compact that is presumed by the word "allies."

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to my eminent friend from Missouri, Senator STONE.

Mr. STONE. The statement of the Senator from Illinois is very interesting to me. Assuming that he is speaking with authority and with knowledge, I would ask him if he is at liberty to state to the Senate at this time exactly what the relations are and the understanding is between the Government of the United States and the Governments of the European allies—the entente allies?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, at the first instance replying to the eminent Senator from Missouri, I have to say that when I am asked upon what authority I speak——

Mr. STONE. I did not ask that. I said I assumed the Senator spoke with authority and with knowledge.

Mr. LEWIS. I answer my honorable friend that I have no higher authority which I quote than that of my judgment, my knowledge, my sense of the position of my Government, and my consciousness that its political relations have not been transformed in that legal way in which they only can be changed, so as to create allies to the United States of European countries.

As to what I understand to be the relation, I say, sir, I draw my understanding from the same evidences which any Senator would be called upon to accept. It is that as to the countries called the entente we find ourselves fighting against the same grievances that they allege to be theirs. That having the same grievances, and anxious, sir, for the maintenance of the cause which they say they fight for—liberty of nations, justice to men, a spirit of democracy abroad to mankind—we have entered into a cooperation of action to the common cause in order to achieve the result, but, as I understand it, with no compact for rewards, with no understanding of compensation, with no agreement of what shall be the ultimate partition or division of results or concessions. To the contrary, we stand solely as those numbers who might be in a lawsuit, arrayed on one side as plaintiff, on the other side as defendant, whose interests may be alike in the issue, but whose results may be separate at the end. Such is only the relationship of alliance, I say to my eminent friend, as I see it.

Mr. STONE. Well, just what is the difference between that understanding and the understanding between Great Britain and France? I am not heckling the Senator.

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator, I understand, is not factious in his questioning but is merely seeking my view.

Mr. STONE. Yes. What is the difference between our attitude and what the Senator from Illinois understands to be the attitude between Great Britain and France, for example?

Mr. LEWIS. I will repeat the question of the Senator from Missouri, because the eminent Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] failed to hear it and asked that it be repeated louder. The Senator from Missouri asks me what is the difference in such a situation as I assume as is that of my country with the entente of Europe and that of Britain and France. I reply, that in my judgment the relationship between Britain and France which brings them together as allies is the result of a compact which takes its character from a previous arrangement, antedating the entering by the military forces into the conflict, and is in response to some form of agreement between them defining their responsibilities toward each other, offensive or defensive, or both; and from which certain benefits are to be derived at some stage of the proceedings or at the conclusion. That is the usual form in which the compact of alliances is made; and I take it, sir, that is the difference between their relationship as allies and the relationship we bear those who are called allies.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, may I be permitted to ask the Senator from Illinois a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator, then, from his statement, would lead us to believe that, in order to be in alliance with the European countries with whom we are now working, there must be a formal treaty. Am I correct in that statement?

Mr. LEWIS. I say to the Senator from Michigan, who has been eminent in the Foreign Relations Committee, that it is my judgment that before I, as a citizen and an official of my country, would accept the theory of the relationship of alliance between this Nation and any other country I would have to see a compact setting forth the terms and responsibilities that had been entered into with those in authority and confirmed by that agency which by the Constitution must give such its approval—this Senate. Such may be called a treaty or by any other designation that may be adopted.

Mr. GALLINGER. Would the compact the Senator holds apply to Italy in the relation of that country with Great Britain and France in this conflict?

Mr. LEWIS. I say to the Senator I do not know with exactness what relation Italy bears to Britain, and I do not know what arrangement. Speaking for myself, if I were asked to define the difference between what makes an alliance between Italy and Britain and the relations between America and Italy, I would have to respond in the same way which I have to the Senator from Missouri as to Britain and France.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the President in his message to Congress and the Vice President in his addresses to the Senate and Senators in the discussion of legislation on the floor refer to our allies, the Senator would give that expression no legal meaning, but would regard it as merely descriptive of a condition into which we have voluntarily gone.

Mr. LEWIS. I would rather accept those observations—just as we use the word "colleague." By that word we technically mean the Senator who represents the same State as does the Senator speaking, and who really is his ally; but generally when we are in such a spirit as we are in moments like this, when there is no partisan division, we always refer to a Senator on either side as "our colleague." I answer the Senator that I regard this adoption of that word allies by the President and Vice President, wherever used, as a mere designation of governmental hospitality.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does the Senator refer to the honor of this Republic?

Mr. LEWIS. I refer to the remarks of the President and Vice President, if used as the Senator says they were.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does not the Senator think that the honor of the Republic has been pledged to the faith of the so-called entente by the officers of this Government as specifically as could have been done by treaty or otherwise?

Mr. LEWIS. I might say, sir, there are some matters in which it may be said our honor has been pledged toward the common result; but that we have pledged any obligation or responsibility in the form of an alliance I can not admit.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. HARDING. This is all so interesting that I would like to ask the Senator from Illinois, in view of the character of our special mission to Russia and the representations which have been made by that mission, what the Senator from Illinois thinks regarding our relations with Russia? I should like to have his opinion on that.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I can only reply to that inquiry literally, as the Senator from Ohio puts it—as to what I think. My thought is that in our relations to Russia we bear the attitude that is designated in diplomacy as "a great and good friend." We wish her well; we would aid her in establishing a Republic; we would lend her our encouragement whenever possible; we would pray that she would take inspiration from our example; but we do not, as I see it, find ourselves under any contractual obligations of any kind that are enforceable by any other method than the voluntary contribution of our generosity.

Mr. President, I seem to have gotten somewhat afield from my proposed discussion because of my voluntary advancement of views touching an international phase of the question. However, I welcome these interruptions and hope that Senators will feel free upon any phase of the discussion to elicit my views with the clearness necessary for full understanding, and that they will tender me theirs in such form as they may think the propriety of the occasion permits.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield.

Mr. KING. The Senator from Illinois is always very choice in the selection of his words and expresses with great nicety the ideas which he seeks to convey. Does not the Senator think, however, that in his denial of any alliance with the entente, with those with whom we are cooperating, he is likely to give a false impression? Does not the word "ally," as we use it and as we understand it, mean an associate, an auxiliary, a friend? And we certainly are an associate of, a friend of, and an auxiliary to those with whom we are fighting against German Prussianism.

Mr. LEWIS. I thank my friend of years for his flattering reference to my method of definition or illustration. I seem not, however, to have been so happy as he credits me in this particular, so far as his understanding has been impressed. I say, Mr. President, to my friend that it may be true that there may be those who will misunderstand my views and my expressions; there will be those who will misconstrue them; there are ever those who will intentionally misapply them. I agree with the Senator from Utah that the technical meaning of the word is all that he says, and that, in so far as it can apply in that hospitable sense of cooperation, I am content to adopt it. But in so far as it is usually accepted in its legal aspect, its international relation of "ally" and "alliance," I am compelled again, sir, to resort to my previous expression, that I can not adopt the definition of our relations in the legal terms "alliance" and "allies" in the sense that they are understood in international compacts generally throughout the world.

Mr. President, nevertheless the Senator has accurately and correctly stated an obligation which arises both from principles of humanity and cooperation in the common cause against the militarism of the Prussian dynasty. We are under obligation to render those by whose side we are fighting every aid which we can, that we may facilitate their undertaking and encourage to success their joint operations, conducted along with our own enterprise. I return to the bill and its aspects.

It is flattering, sir, to dwell a moment upon our own situation. We were suddenly precipitated into this conflict, despite the prayers of our people to be exempt from it, and, of course, against the hopes of all of those who desired peace—but with justice. Sir, a nation which had been unaccustomed in its practices to war, which had been devoted to peace, stood opposed to those nations to whose generations had been transmitted by their fathers the ideals and theory of conquest of country by war. These latter stood panoplied and ever ready for conflict. Their trumpets were blowing, their fifes piping, their men marching, their drums rolling, their huzzas echoing in the winds at all times under some form or circumstance. Sometimes in the pomp of war, sometimes as attendant upon the ratification of an alliance which as between themselves and a former opponent had been consummated to aid in future war with future opponents. Not so with America. She had educated herself to the reverse. Hers was preparation for peace, ever for peace, never for war. Yet, despite all that, might I invoke my brethren of the Senate to recall, with the gratification I know they will feel at the mere mention—how quietly, without ostentation, without alarm, without boasts this country moved to the undertaking after it was decreed. How now we are confronted with the established fact of the thousands of our heroes who have landed upon the shores of countries in Europe, prepared to enter into this conflict for the honor of their Nation. All without noise, without bombast, without boasts—by her valiant agencies having this trust to execute. America, ever true to that characteristic quality so dominant in her nature, when called on to do, does. We have presented to the world at the very first evidence of the undertaking a splendid quality of achievement, a forerunner of that which will surely make for success.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Is not the Senator in danger of forfeiting our right to boast that we have not boasted? I trust he will not do that.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, the Senator would intimate that my calling the attention of the Senate to these events of achievement is a boast and would condemn me as inconsistent. I referred to the fact that those who are accomplishing these achievements made no boast. I, who can not take credit for them and can not say that I contributed very much to their advancement, delight, as a citizen of America, to behold those who did the deed without boast and boast in behalf of the deed they did.

Mr. President, I have referred to the need of food; but to a assemblage like this I do not have to dwell much upon that necessity. Surely it is in the memory of those learned in history sitting around me how necessary was food at critical moments in the contests between countries in the great encounters called war. Who of us will not remember the reported cry of one at Waterloo: "Will Blücher never come?" or of another who said: "Could we but get bread, we could last three days longer." Had this commander endured but three hours longer, the fate of Europe would to-day have been different—I can not say better; I know not; but we know it was for the want of food at Waterloo that the very map of civilization was changed, and the fates of mankind diverted in different directions from that which to-day is our inheritance.

You recall Victor Hugo, referring to this in Les Miserables, and saying, "Yet shall the cry say only that it was absence of bread. I say it was the presence of God. He may have chosen His way, that without bread France could not march or fight; but the question after all was, God or Napoleon; and God chose His way, that it be God, and not Napoleon." But, sir, it was the want of bread that gave to Waterloo the opportunity for all that Waterloo represents.

How well, Senators, you recall that the Crimea would have been won by Russia over Britain if the food from Russia could have gotten down to the water. It was diverted by public pilferers at a place called Trebizond, which we know now in history of this war is in Turkey. There it withered under the hands of those who stole it, never finding its way to the armies. The soldiers of Russia famished in hunger, while Britain's sustained forces were enabled at the Crimea to advance and carry the standard which finally resulted in the compromise which we speak of as the surrender of Sebastopol.

You, Senators, lived a few months ago through an experience when you watched Germany fight Russia upon the eastern front, and Russia, with her thousands of men—large in number, indeed, compared to her opponents'—failed at the threshold of the undertaking for the want of ammunition and food. She could have done without the ammunition and waited for that if her soldiers had not been starved by the avariciousness of those who led in those days in Russia, and the corruption of those who controlled this food for speculation and riches in that hour.

Shall we see these things and fail to understand them and to learn something from them? And, sirs, did you read at the beginning of this week the report upon Gallipoli, the cause of the failure of the British forces to have been successful at the Dardanelles? Did you behold, Senators, that in the report on Gallipoli the answer is, the men had stood two days and two nights with little water, and that of typhoid germ and sickening, and all without food, for that it was impossible to secure it? The men languished in hunger, fainted and fell—some to their death and all to their disaster.

With these lessons before us it will not be difficult to impress upon the mind of any hearer these examples as the justification for this bill. It is that we by this bill shall avoid errors through which others have blundered, many have failed, and all involved gone to their destruction. The bill, as a system of legislation, is charged to be an innovation. I concede it. It is an unusual step. This I admit. It is said that it is without precedent in this country. I confess it. But, sir, the conditions of the country are without parallel in our history, the dangers without precedent, the possible consequences without record in our history or that of any other country.

This unexampled situation, sir, calls for action unparalleled in situation and without precedent. We fit the deed to the necessity.

Then, Mr. President, what purpose has the bill? First, that we might encourage food production at the hands of those whose industry brings it forth from the earth—the farmers. Next, that we might provide a method for its distribution to those who must live upon the enjoyment of it. Third, that we shall send it in its distribution to the armies, that they may be maintained in the conflict. Those armies of America and those who are cooperating with us abroad, and those who are moving from our homes to the foreign field of contest. Finally, to prevent the middleman food monopolist from hoarding for his riches the products of man to the impoverishment of the people.

Mr. President, it becomes necessary, therefore, to provide methods in a law by which no agency shall circumvent these purposes. It becomes necessary, sir, that we shall defeat those who have manipulated prices from executing their nefarious designs to the extent where they hunger their fellow citizens and imperil the success of their own country. Sirs, we can not be nice as to every detail in such undertaking. To say that the bill is not subject to criticism is to arrogate to ourselves perfection. This would be a virtue professed that would be a vice confessed. But, sir, that these things, even if deficiencies by some standard, are made necessary and justifiable by the circumstances can not be disputed. In the philosophy of Portia, we may "do a little wrong to do a great good."

Then, Mr. President, it is said that this bill, with these provisions, has been left to the President to execute according to his discretion. It is charged that this unusual power is invested in the Chief Magistrate and thus violates our fixed standards. Eminent Senators contend, as eminent Members of the House have contended, and other spokesmen all over the country asserted that granting this power is in opposition to the very theory of our Republic. In part I confess the charge. But, sir, going into war in Europe for the maintenance of the Republic of America is at variance with the theory upon which this Republic was founded. Distance so very great, isolation so distant, indicated to our fathers that there could never be this necessity. Invention, science, evolution of time, revolution of events, perfection of instrumentalities, effecting changes in civilization, have wrought these new results. Our Revolutionary fathers could not have contemplated this present era, nor, indeed, could their sons of the days of our civil reconstruction have foreseen it, nor we to have planned for it. Therefore, if it be said as to these innovations, "This was not contemplated by those who founded the Republic," I reply, "Neither were the situations with which we are compelled to contend and for which we are obliged to prepare."

But, Mr. President, what is it that opposes this power we would vest? I answer and say it is a sentiment. The distinguished Senators who oppose this power being vested in the President do so because of their sentiment born of long education, transmitted from their noble sires, and enjoyed in themselves. It is their inborn creed that it is better to adhere to that which has been fixed by standards that have withstood trial than to undertake innovations. Theirs is the theory expressed in Hamlet—

> And makes us rather bear those ills we have
> Than fly to others that we know not of.

It is because of this sentiment they have had with regard to our institutions, to the methods through which they have been formed, to the courses in which they have been exercised and executed, that these Senators, fearing that a departure from them might lead to consequences more dangerous than any evil now upon us; oppose the entrance upon them. But I ask the able Senators—and I refer particularly to those who have given such critical analyses to this bill and discussion to its provisions—I ask where is the particular provision of the Constitution which inveighs against the proposed provisions of this bill? Where is the letter of the law which it violates? Where is the provision of statute or Constitution written in the fundamental law of the Republic which prohibits the exercise of this power by the President?

Mr. REED rose.

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to my friend, the Senator from Missouri, if he rises for the purpose of interrogating me.

Mr. REED. I did. In looking up the exact words of the Constitution—I shall not stop to read it, because the words are too familiar——

Mr. LEWIS. Let the Senator feel free to quote from his memory anything he chooses to assume as opposed——

Mr. REED. But the provision of the Constitution which provides that there is reserved to the States and the people thereof all powers not granted, shifts the burden upon those who claim these powers to exist to put their finger on the clause of the Constitution granting the powers.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I am pleased to have the eminent leader of this contest of constitutional construction—from the viewpoint of those opposing the bill—express the basis upon which he rests his contention; and here my eminent friend—whose distinguished ability I certify to in any forum that I am privileged to speak—here he and I now separate upon our views. I contend that the eminent Senators who present that viewpoint have not considered with the characteristic industry of their natures the real meaning of our Constitution. I answer: the clause to which the eminent Senator alludes and to which the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] referred, as did my distinguished colleague from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN], has no relation whatever to war or to present conditions. First, the clause in the Constitution relates to the internal relations between the United States and its States and its Executive. It refers, and was only intended to refer, to the relations borne between the States and the Nation in their internal affairs with each other. It is a mere reservation that the power of the people is ever with them and is never surrendered, and that in the relation of the State and the Nation only those powers that are expressed are yielded by the local bodies called States to the Union body called United States.

But, sir, that was for the specific objects of government of States and Nation in matters of domestic concern of the United States, within the United States. The exception to that was specifically provided, as I see it, in that provision which gave to the President of the United States the right and the power to command the armies. When Congress was given the power to declare war, and war was declared, then to repose the whole power of its execution in the President. There, sir, as between the United States as a Nation and a foreign foe, those reserved rights of the States have no application whatever.

Therefore, Mr. President, here is where the eminent Senator from Missouri and his colleagues in this discussion and myself differ. I contend that the power by the Constitution vesting in the President of the United States, as Commander in Chief, the command of the armies, vests him with all the power that is necessary to command those armies to success, and authorizes him to command anything and everything that is necessary to command that success. Otherwise the power conferred by the Constitution on him to command would be useless and fruitless. He could command by an order to march and fight, but would be powerless to command the things that could enable them to march or fight to success.

Mr. BORAH, Mr. WOLCOTT, and Mr. REED addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield, and to whom?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, giving precedence to the order in which Senators rose, I beg to yield to the Senator from Idaho, who first addressed the Chair.

Mr. BORAH. Do I understand the Senator's contention to be—and I am asking for the purpose of getting correctly his viewpoint—that when war is declared, the authority conferred upon the President as Commander in Chief of the Army justifies the President in commanding the men and the resources of the country to the extent of the discretion of the Commander in Chief?

Mr. LEWIS. I do, in matters necessary to success of the war—to the extent that his discretion may direct. Subject ever, of course, to the supervision of the legislative body whenever that exercise of discretion might transcend the policy of preservation of our own country.

Mr. BORAH. I think the logic of the Senator from Illinois—assuming that the Constitution is more or less suspended, as the saying is—is a perfectly correct logic; that it ultimately lands all power in the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States; and Congress is, if you please, as unessential in that kind of a scheme as any other department of the Government; and that the President, as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, may command the resources of the country and direct the resources of the country and fight the battles of the country without Congress, or against the views of Congress, if he sees fit. Of course I do not accept the premises, but if I should I would feel that I must follow the reasoning to its legitimate results.

Mr. LEWIS. Certainly.

Mr. REED. And command Congress, of course—for that would be included—and command the Supreme Court, certainly, for that would clearly be included.
